

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND, FROM THE FIRST INVASION BY THE ROMANS TO THE ACCESSION OF WILLIAM AND MARY
IN 1688.

By JOHN LINGARD, D.D.

The Sixth Edition, Revised and considerably Enlarged,

IN TEN VOLUMES.

VOL. I.

LONDON:
CHARLES HOLMAN, 61, NEW BOND STREET, AND 23, PARADISE GARD, 207.
MDCCCXV.

MEMOIR OF THE REV. DR. LINGARD,

BY THE REV. M. A. TIERNEY, F.R.S., F.S.A.,

Canon of St. George's, Southwark.

It has been frequently, and not unnaturally, remarked, that the history of an author's life is little more than the history of his works. Withdrawn from the world, and communing with his own mind in the retirement of his study, he neither shares in the excitement, nor mingles in the throng, of passing events. The field of action is not his sphere: the labours of ambition are not his delight. He has neither deep intrigue, nor brilliant exploit, nor daring adventure, to offer to the admiration of the world. His life flows on, a calm, quiet, gentle stream, unmarked, save by the murmur of its waters and the freshness that appears upon its banks.

The subject of the present memoir is not an exception to the general rule. Though living during a period of more than ordinary religious and political excitement, he took no ostensible part in the turmoil and contention that surrounded him: though consulted on every matter of importance in the Church of which he was so distinguished a member, his name was seldom heard in connection with the events of the day. Neither honours nor employments could withdraw him from the retirement of his study; nor could the offer of the highest dignities induce him to abandon the seclusion to which he had devoted his life.

MEMOIR OF

THE REV. DR. LINGARD,

BY THE REV. M. A. TIERNEY, F.R.S., F.S.A.,

Canon of St. George's, Southwark.

It has been frequently, and not unnaturally, remarked, that the history of an author's life is little more than the history of his works. Withdrawn from the world, and communing with his own mind in the retirement of his study, he neither shares in the excitement, nor mingles in the throng, of passing events. The field of action is not his sphere: the labours of ambition are not his delight. He has neither deep intrigue, nor brilliant exploit, nor daring adventure, to offer to the admiration of the world. His life flows on, a calm, quiet, gentle stream, unmarked, save by the murmur of its waters and the freshness that appears upon its banks.

The subject of the present memoir is not an exception to the general rule. Though living during a period of more than ordinary religious and political excitement, he took no ostensible part in the turmoil and contention that surrounded him: though consulted on every matter of importance in the Church of which he was so distinguished a member, his name was seldom heard in connection with the events of the day. Neither honours nor employments could withdraw him from the retirement of his study; nor could the offer of the highest dignities induce him to abandon the seclusion to which he had devoted his life.

MEMOIR OF

the School of Theology, in October, 1792.* But a cloud was gathering over the destinies of France,—and that College, which had so long been “the nurse of martyrs and the bulwark of the faith,” was already destined to destruction. For some time, and especially during the preceding year, the increasing violence of the democratical party had surrounded its inmates with alarms. Twice had the garrison of the town broken loose: the excesses of the soldiery had again and again intruded within the walls of the College: and while blood was flowing in the market-place, and peaceful citizens were being hurried to the gibbet, the bayonet had been pointed at the breasts of the students, and the sword had more than once been bared over the heads of the superiors of the house. It was only in the June of 1790, that our youthful student had himself narrowly escaped destruction. He had wandered into the town, at the moment when the populace, with frantic yells, were dragging a Mons. Derbaix to execution. He was acquainted with the victim. His feelings prompted him to approach the crowd and inquire into the cause of the present proceeding: but his dress attracted the notice of the rabble: a cry, first, of “La Calotte,” and then of “Le Calotin à la lanterne,” roused him to a sense of his danger: and it was only by the fleetness of his steps that he was able to escape the fury of his pursuers.

These events naturally awakened the anxieties both of Superiors and students. Still, the protection derived to them, as British subjects, from the provisions of the treaty of commerce, and from the presence of an ambassador in Paris, gave them some confidence: nor was it until the murder of the king, and the declaration of war by England, in the early part of 1793, that they became fully sensible of their perilous situation. Within three weeks, however, after the latter of those events, the forcible occupation of the College by an armed body of the rabble warned the more prudent, or the more timid, to provide for their safety. The young Lingard saw the danger, and resolved, if possible, to elude it. Many had already sought and found an opportunity to withdraw from the country. Their example encouraged him to make the attempt; and, on the 21st of February, 1793, he left the College, in company with William, afterwards Lord Stourton, and two brothers named Oliveira. Before the orders were issued which removed the remainder of the community to Escherquin, and thence to the citadel of Dourlens, he had safely effected his retreat into England.*

* Diary of Douay College.—In the ordinary course he should have commenced his theological studies in 1791; but an interruption of twelve months, from October in that year, had occurred, during which he was employed in teaching the school of Grammar.

DR. LINGARD.

It was not unnatural that the talents which he possessed, combined with the attention which he had been able to bestow on the youthful companions of his flight, should have recommended him to the patronage of Lord Stourton, the father of one of them. By that nobleman he was immediately invited to his residence. At the same time, he received from him the appointment of tutor to the son in whose company he had escaped; and, during the next twelve months, continued to superintend the studies, and direct the pursuits, of his youthful friend. Meanwhile, however, a party of the students, who had contrived to elude the vigilance of the guards at Dourlens, had arrived in England, and had found a temporary refuge in a school kept by the Rev. Arthur Storey, at Tudhoe, a village about six miles from Durham. Lingard had heard of their arrival, and, at the invitation of Bishop Gibson, had agreed to join them. With this view, therefore, he mentioned the circumstance to Lord Stourton, and, having signified his desire to resume his studies, solicited and obtained permission to resign the charge of his pupil. In the course of the summer, 1794, he repaired to Tudhoe, and assumed the direction of the little community, which had there been formed. In September, he removed, with his companions, to Pontop, the missionary residence of the Rev. Thomas Eyre; and, a few weeks later, accompanied the party to its final destination at Crook Hall, a dilapidated mansion, near Durham, which Bishop Gibson had hired and fitted up for its reception. It was on the 15th of October, 1794, that eight individuals, the sad but honoured representatives of the College of Douay, took possession of Crook Hall, and once more resumed their collegiate exercises. The seminary was now permanently embodied. Mr. Eyre, by the authority of Bishop Gibson, was installed as president; and Lingard, who had rapidly completed his course of theology, received the appointment of vice-president. In the following spring (April 18, 1795), he was ordained priest by Bishop Gibson at York.* About the same time, he became Prefect of the Studies, and for many years filled the chair both of Natural and Moral Philosophy.

* A letter written from the college on the day on which Lingard took his departure gives the following account of the state of things at that time. "On the morning of Monday last, the 18th of the present month, a body of national guards was ordered to assemble at the Market Place, without being informed of the design of their expedition. They were no sooner assembled, and the commissaries from the district arrived, but they filed off to the five British establishments, which are settled in the town. We had not been informed of their coming till a few moments before their arrival, when some people, with countenances bespeaking their fears, ran to inform us that the guards were assembled to expel us from our habitations. I leave you to judge of our alarm at this information. They arrived soon after, and summoned the president and some others into the parlour. There an apostate priest and monk of Marchiennes, as a member of the district, read over a warrant which authorized them to impose the national seals upon the goods and papers of the college, as also those of the superiors. On leaving the parlour, the guards dispersed themselves in different galleries; some few excepted, who attended the commissaries in the different places where they laid the seals. The guards in general formed a despicable collection,—they were seemingly the scum of the town: the commissaries were equally unknown to us. The places on which the seals are to be seen are the president's and procurator's chests and papers, the divines' library, the curiosity room, the street-doors of the bakehouse, infirmary, and church. The sacristy was left untouched: the refectory plate in part was seen, but nothing taken. We are, indeed, apprehensive that, when they come to erase the seals, an entire inventory of our goods will be taken, after which term they will be said to be no more at our disposal. . . . There is no one amongst us who discovers reason for hope; but I suppose we shall linger on a month or two longer. . . . We have had two or three guards in the house since Monday last, the most ill-looking fellows you ever saw, so that we are obliged to have one or two to sit up to guard them."

MEMOIR OF

In his position as Professor, the future historian soon displayed those abilities for imparting information and instruction, which so eminently distinguished him through life. With a mind singularly clear and distinct in its perceptions, with a patience and perseverance not easy to be discomfited, he mastered whatever he attempted himself, and trained his pupils to follow in the same course. He seized their objections; he resolved their difficulties; and, while he gained their affections by the kindness of his manner, he never failed to improve their minds by the simplicity and energy of his instructions. "I remember," says a living prelate, in a letter addressed to the writer of the present memoir,—“I remember that, when I had the good fortune, as a boy, to be Dr. Lingard's pupil, I learned more in one month, than I had done in six, under my former pedagogue;* and I also remember that, while he was listening to me translating Latin into English, he was turning over the leaves of a large folio, and making notes for his future history of England;—and yet nothing escaped him of what I was reading.”

* Ushaw Register of Ordinations.

DR. LINGARD.

In the summer of 1808, the purchase of a small estate, and the erection of a more commodious house, enabled the community to remove to Ushaw. Lingard accompanied it in this last and more fortunate migration; and, during the next three years, continued to lend to the rising establishment the benefit of his abilities and his zeal.

By those who have seen, and can remember, the houses at Pontop and Crook, their confined dimensions, their limited accommodation, their bleak and miserable apartments, the hardships and privations endured by their inmates, during a space of fourteen years, will be easily imagined. But the men whom they sheltered had grown up in a school which laughed such considerations to scorn. They had been trained where confessors had lived, and whence martyrs had gone forth to their crown. They had been taught to look at labour as their daily food, and had learned to light up the darkest and the dreariest hours of life with a cheerfulness that was never at fault. Of the sacrifices which they made, and the shifts to which they were reduced, during their residence at these places, a thousand stories are told; to the expedients, by which they sought at once to improve their minds and forget the discomforts of their situation, we are indebted for the first, and not the least interesting, of the publications of our historian.

* A term used at Douay, and still retained at Ushaw and Old Hall, for a private tutor.

MEMOIR OF

In the evenings of winter, when each, according to his ability, was ready to bring in his contribution of amusement, they not unfrequently assembled for the reading of some original paper, produced by the industry of one or other of their body. From an early period, the mind of Lingard had been accustomed to dwell on the antiquities of his country.* Perhaps his residence in a neighbourhood, where Jarrow and Weremouth still recalled the memory of Bede, and where Lindisfarne, and Hexham, and Tynemouth, and a hundred others, were yet eloquent of the past, contributed, in no small degree, to confirm the original bent of his genius. For the amusement of his companions, and in moments snatched from the various duties of his office, he embodied his thoughts on this subject in a series of detached papers. These papers were read by him to his friends at the evening fireside. They treated of the establishment of the faith among our Saxon ancestors, of the origin and progress of the monastic institute, of the government of the Church, of the religious practices of the people, of the learning, the literature, and the laws of the Anglo-Saxon times. As the reader advanced, the interest of his audience grew more intense: the extent of his reading and the depth of his research struck them at once with surprise and admiration: and when, at length, the series drew to a close, they united with one accord in urging him to mould the detached parts into a regular form, and publish them as a connected history. For a long time, his diffidence or his modesty withstood the application. At length, however, the importunity of his friends prevailed, and the work, since known as "The Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church," was committed to the press in Newcastle. It was published in 1806, in two volumes. Four years later, a second edition was issued from the same place; but, in 1844, he "recast the entire work," and, having added "a large portion of new and interesting matter," gave it to the world in the following year through the press of Mr. Dolman. Of this enlarged edition of the "Anglo-Saxon Church," and of the two powerful articles by the same writer in the "Dublin Review" (vols. viii. and xi.)—one entitled, "Did the Church of England Reform Herself?" the other, "The Ancient Church of England and the Liturgy of the Anglican Church"—it has been well observed, that they did more, in their quiet, unpretending, unostentatious way, to crush the pretensions, and dissipate the sophistry, of the Oxford writers, than all the essays and all the lucubrations put together of any and of every other writer.*

* For his instruction and amusement, whilst yet a child, his mother "was accustomed to hire books, particularly historical ones, which he seemed eager to peruse."—Mrs. Lingard's narrative.

In a notice so necessarily brief as the present, it would be impossible to give anything like a detailed account of all the minor publications of this eminent writer. His three letters addressed to the editor of the Newcastle Courant, on the subject of Catholic loyalty, were published in 1807, at a moment of great political excitement, and bear all the marks of that keen but polished satire, which generally distinguished his earlier polemical writings. They were followed or accompanied by his tracts, in answer to the charge of the Bishop of Durham, and to the replies and rejoinders poured forth by Philpotts, Faber, Coates, Hollingsworth, Le Mesurier, and other Episcopal defenders; and these again, at a later period, were succeeded by his pamphlet on the power of the Popes in this country; by his reviews of the anti-Catholic publications of Lord Kenyon, Dr. Huntingford, Dr. Tomline, and Dr. Burgess; by his "Strictures on Dr. Marsh's 'Comparative View of the Churches of England and Rome;'"† and by his

* The two Articles here mentioned, which were written at Cardinal Wiseman's own request and published as a foundation and support of his own arguments, sufficiently prove that the "friendly warning," to which that prelate alludes in one of his prefaces (Essays, II. vii.), was intended, not to "chill" the ardour, or discourage the exertions of the controversialist in his encounters with the Oxford writers, but simply to guard him against those "hopeful views," in reference to the approaching "Conversion of England," which recent experience has so significantly and so painfully shown to have been visionary.

† When these "Strictures" appeared, Dr. Kipling, then dean of Peterborough, whose blundering propensities are celebrated under the head of short treatise, written in answer to Sir John Cox Hippisley's Report to the House of Commons, and entitled "Observations on the Laws and Ordinances of Foreign States, relative to the religious concerns of their Catholic subjects." These were all collected and published in one octavo volume, in 1826: and, like the pamphlet entitled "The Widow Woolfrey versus the Vicar of Carisbrook," which he subsequently wrote as a "Tract for the Times," and which was printed by the Catholic Institute, may be justly regarded as models of polemical and theological excellence.

MEMOIR OF

In September, 1811, our author retired from Ushaw. In the spring of that year, he had been urged by Bishop Moylan to accept the presidency of the college at Maynooth. But he declined the offer, as, at a later period, he declined a similar offer from Dr. Poynter, in reference to Old Hall: and, adopting a course which was more agreeable to his habits and disposition, he withdrew to the secluded mission at Hornby.

He was now in a situation to pursue his studies, with but slight interruption from his professional duties; and the first fruits of his leisure were given to the world in some of the publications which have been already mentioned, followed or accompanied by his masterly preface to one of the Dublin editions of "Ward's Errata of the Protestant Bible," by his introduction to "The Protestant's Apology for the Roman Catholic Church," published by Mr. Talbot, in 1812; and by "Kiplingisms," in the Cambridge "Dictionary of Colloquial Expressions," took offence at the term "Modern Church of England," which Lingard had employed; and, imagining that it came within the category of "seditious words, in derogation of the established religion," wrote to Lingard through the public papers, informing him that, unless, within "a reasonable time," he should "publish a vindication of this defamatory language," he should be indicted under the statute, and "summoned to answer for his offensive demeanour in Westminster Hall." By way of reply, Lingard merely advertised the "Strictures" in all the papers which had contained the dean's letter: and Kipling, after another letter, and a short rejoinder from Lingard repeating the original offence, affected to discover that the latter was not, as he had supposed, "a popish priest," and "entreated pardon" for having entertained "the erroneous notion!" Here the matter dropped; but the litigious ardour of the dean was not lost upon the wits of Cambridge, whose merriment on the occasion was exhibited in an abundant supply of anecdotes to Lingard, at the expense of his fiery assailant.

various other treatises of equal ability and learning. Meanwhile he was silently, and almost unconsciously, preparing for that great work, which was to crown the pyramid of his fame, and to render a service to religion and the world, such as no other man or men in this generation could have performed. From the moment when his "Anglo-Saxon Church" had appeared, his friends had never ceased to urge him to a continuance of the work, and to the publication of a general history of the country. Their importunities, however, had been met by reasons which it would be impossible to discuss in this place. He hesitated to embark in an undertaking which might be injurious to the interests of the college: and, during his residence at Ushaw, the design, if ever conceived, was abandoned. With his removal to Hornby the subject was revived. The solicitations of his friends again came to assist the inclination of his genius; and, after some time, it was generally understood that he was employed on this important work. But the reader will be surprised to learn that an abridgment for the use of schools was all that his modesty had allowed him to contemplate. Writing to a friend, in August, 1813, he says, "I have proceeded but a short way in my abridgment of English History for the use of schools:..... as to the Anglo-Norman Church, I must leave that to some future period." Two years later, he tells the same friend that he has "buried Henry VII.," and is returning to revise the earlier portion of the work. But his researches had already led him beyond the limits which he had originally assigned to himself. When he returned to revise, he found it "necessary to rewrite what he had previously written:" the "abridgment" was thrown aside; and his energies were now directed to the great work that was before him.

In April, 1817, he left England with a party of friends, on a tour to Rome and the southern states of Italy. The party arrived in Rome on the evening of the 25th of May; and Lingard, who had been commissioned by Dr. Poynter to negotiate some matters of importance, proceeded at once to deliver his letters of introduction, and to call on the several cardinals to whom they were directed. The first, which was presented by Mr. McPherson, the president of the Scotch College, was addressed to Litta, the prefect of Propaganda. It was accompanied by a copy of the Anglo-Saxon Antiquities, and of the Reply to Sir John Cox Hippisley's Report; and was received by the cardinal with the most gracious assurance of welcome, with promises of assistance whenever it might be required, and with an undertaking, in furtherance of the historical researches of the new visitor, to facilitate his admission to the libraries, and to procure for him transcripts of such unpublished documents as he might want. The presentation of this letter of introduction was followed by the personal visit of Lingard himself. Unfortunately, however, in the interval which had elapsed, another letter, written by ———, had arrived from England. Of the precise nature of its contents no mention was made, but it had "cooled the friendly ardour of the cardinal;" and Lingard, instead of the welcome which he had anticipated, was briefly told that his Eminence was acquainted with the calumnies contained in Hume; that Dr. Milner, in his "History of Winchester," and his "Letters to a Prebendary," had already exposed and refuted them; that the same prelate had sufficiently replied to the "Report of Sir John Cox Hippisley" by his "Humble Remonstrance;" and, as the inference from all this, that any further researches for the purposes of English history were unnecessary, or of trifling importance. Lingard, though mortified at this reception, was not deterred from the pursuit of his object. He successively waited on the other members of the Sacred College, to whom the letters of Dr. Poynter had introduced him. By all he was received with courtesy and respect; by Consalvi, the cardinal secretary of state, with a kindness and condescension, which abundantly compensated for the indifference or the unwillingness of Litta. Every request was granted; every facility was secured to him; and, when he left Rome, he had the satisfaction of informing Dr. Poynter that he had succeeded in his mission, and, among other matters, that the English College was again restored to the government of the secular clergy. During his stay, the archives of the Vatican had, by the orders of Cardinal Consalvi, been unreservedly opened to him. But, unfortunately, the privilege was of little use. "Everything," he says in his Diary, "had been thrown into so much confusion by the French Revolution, that I did not procure all the codices I wanted."

MEMOIR OF

DR. LINGARD.

The party returned by the Simplon, and, having visited Geneva and the Glaciers, of which his Journal contains an amusing description, arrived in England before the beginning of September. By the end of the year, he found himself sufficiently advanced with his work to think of publication. Writing to Mr. Kirk, in January, 1818, he says, "I am now in treaty with a Protestant bookseller in London. If it be concluded (I doubt it much), I shall of course appear during what is called the season in London; and, as it is too late for me to appear this year, I shall come into the world next year." The treaty, however, was concluded. For the sum of one thousand guineas, Mr. Mawman became the purchaser of so much of the history as should extend to the death of Henry VII.: and, in the early part of the year 1819, the three volumes embracing that period were published. In the succeeding year, the reigns of Henry VIII. and his son appeared in a fourth volume: those of Mary and Elizabeth, James and the two Charleses, followed at various intervals: and, in the spring of 1830, the eighth and concluding volume brought the history down to the Revolution of 1688. In the mean time, the reputation of the work had been rapidly extending, with the appearance of each succeeding volume. At home and on the continent, it had been hailed with admiration, by scholars of every creed and every shade of opinion. A second and a third edition had long since been called for in England: * translations in French and German.

* For the second edition he received 1,333*l.*; for each of the last five volumes of the first edition, 350*l.*: making, with the thousand guineas paid by Mawman for the first three volumes, a gross sum of 4,133*l.* for these two editions. In reference to this subject, and as an evidence of the manner in which the interests of Religion entered into all his views and intentions, I ought to add that the establishment of several bursas, for the education of ecclesiastical students at Ushaw, was only one of the many charitable and had been published: an Italian translation had been commenced, and was printing, by the Pope's desire, at the press of the Propaganda;* an English edition was in course of publication in America; and another in ten volumes had already been issued by the Parisian bookseller, Galignani. In France, by a special decree of the University of Paris, it was ordered that a copy should be placed in the library of every College, and that copies should be distributed as prizes to the students in philosophy and rhetoric. In Rome, from its first appearance, it had been received with a delight bordering upon enthusiasm. "Your fourth volume," writes Dr. Gradwell, then president of the English College, "arrived here about three weeks ago, to the joy of the whole house.....As soon as we have finished it once over, it is bespoken at the Scotch college; then by Father O'Finan, of the Irish Dominicans; then by Monsignor Testa, the Pope's Latin secretary; then by Father Grandi Procurator-general of the Barnabites, with whom Cardinal Fontana, his predecessor, lives. Their eagerness is extreme. We have heard it with the highest satisfaction. For my own part, I never read a volume of history with so much pleasure.....Every succeeding volume increases in interest..... You must have a D.D. postfixed to your name in the title-page of the next." And that distinction was accorded to him. The Pope (it was Pius VII.), aware of his merits, resolved to bestow on him a public testimony of his approbation; and, on the 24th of August, 1821, caused a brief to be issued, in which, after an affectionate recital of his labours in the cause of religion, and in defence of the authority of the Holy See (hujus præcipuè S. Sedis defensionem), he conferred on him the triple academical laurel, and created him Doctor of Divinity, and of religious purposes, to which he devoted the large sums of money derived from his various writings.

MEMOIR OF

* "Gregori's translation of your History is going to press forthwith. It will be printed at Propaganda. New types are casting for the purpose. It will be published by subscription. The Pope subscribes for two hundred copies."—(Dr. Gradwell to Lingard, Oct. 2, 1827). "Cardinal Cristaldi, Tesoriere Generale, subscribes, in his ministerial capacity, for either 300 or 500 copies. . . . The list was increasing daily when I left Rome."—Same to Same, Jan. 23, 1829.

Canon and Civil Law. Nor was Leo XII. less attached to him than his predecessor. When, in the summer of 1825, he paid his second visit to Rome, that pontiff saw him frequently, and always expressed the greatest affection for him. On more than one occasion, he endeavoured to persuade him to take up his residence in Rome. "Was there nothing," he once inquired, "that he could give him, which would induce him to comply with this desire?" The historian referred to his work, and to the necessity of being in England to complete it. "But why?" asked the Pope;—"all the libraries in Italy will be open to you." "Yes, but I want original papers, which will be found only in England." "How long then will it take you to finish?"—"This," adds Lingard, who tells the story in a letter to a friend, "I put off with some indefinite answer." Leo, however, at parting, gave him the gold medal which etiquette then generally confined to cardinals and princes; and, at a creation of cardinals in the following year, informed the Consistory, that, among those whom he had reserved in petto for the same dignity, was one, "a man of great talents, an accomplished scholar, whose writings, drawn ex authenticis fontibus, had not only rendered great service to religion, but had delighted and astonished Europe."* In Rome, this was generally understood to refer to the historian of England. To him, however, it suggested only uneasiness and alarm: and his first anxiety, on receiving the report, was to avert the threatened dignity. "Testa," he says in a letter to a correspondent, "wrote the allocution. He is my particular friend: and I have informed him that the report has reached me; that I have laughed at it; but that, if I suspected it were true, I should expect from his friendship for me, that he would use all his influence with the Pope (they spend many of their evenings together), to divert him from his purpose. In fact, I cannot bear the idea of expatriating myself, much less of shackling myself with all the state and formality of the Roman court."

The progress of the history had not entirely absorbed the attention of Dr. Lingard. On his return from Rome, in October, 1825, his learning was displayed in two powerful articles inserted in the "British Critic;" one on the works of Joannes Corippus, the other on an Armenian version of Eusebius, which had been brought by his friend, Mr. Brown, from the Armenian convent at Venice. In the following June, the ferocious attack levelled at him by Mr. Allen, in the "Edinburgh Review," called his mind in another direction, and afforded him an opportunity of replying to the charges of the various assailants of his history. Some time during the October of 1825, Dr. Lingard, through the agency and at the request of Mawman, had inserted in the British Press newspaper an article on the authenticity of a MS. in the king's library at Paris. It was written anonymously: but the writer had incautiously spoken of an interview between himself and Mons. Buchon, the king's librarian, on the subject of this MS.; and Mawman, unfortunately, in conveying it to the Press for publication, had, unknown to Lingard, added to it a passage, which reflected in some manner upon Allen.* The latter saw the passage; and, availing himself of the clue afforded by the mention of M. Buchon, made application to that gentleman; ascertained that Lingard was the person who had examined the MS. in question; and, to revenge the affront which he supposed to have been offered by the historian, immediately wrote the article on the Massacre of St. Bartholomew.† Lingard, when he saw the review, was startled for the moment. "I must own," he says in one of his letters, "that, at the first view, I could not contemplate such an array of authorities and citations without feeling some alarm : but that alarm began to subside, when I saw the reviewer, at the conclusion, toiling and writhing under the attempt to reconcile his theory with an undisputed fact ; and it existed no longer, when I had compared my own statement with the critique."* In the course of a few weeks, he had prepared his reply. In it he denounced the ungenerous and unfair dealing of his assailant ; hinted at the motives which had produced the attack ; and, having exposed the artifices and misrepresentations of the review, effectually established the correctness of his original statement. With the reply to Allen he united a short notice of the strictures published by Mr. Todd on his character of Cranmer, and of those inserted in the sixty-fifth number of the "Quarterly Review," on the subject of Anne Boleyn : and while his immediate friends were congratulating him on the result of his encounter, Sir William Hamilton, professor of history in the University of Edinburgh, Mr. Petrie, of the Tower, Dr. Kaye, bishop of Bristol, and most of the leading scholars of the day, were loudly proclaiming him victorious. The publication of the secret despatches of Salviati, a few years later, finally decided the question in his favour.

* Dr. Gradwell to Lingard, from Rome, Nov. 11, 1826.

MEMOIR OF

* A writer in the "Dublin Review" (xii. 351) says, that the letter in the British Press was written by Mr. Sedgwick, Commissioner of the Board of Stamps. Lingard, however, in all his correspondence at the time, acknowledges himself to be the author: though, in one of his letters to Mawman (Nov. 5, 1826), he adds—"I recollect that there was something rather sharp added to what I wrote; but the exact particulars I know not now." Possibly, the additional matter was the work of Sedgwick.

† "Dr. Allen met Mr. Butler at Brighton, and, without any introduction, told him that he should never have written the article, had it not been to revenge himself on me for the letter published in the newspaper last year, at the end of which was something that highly offended him."—Lingard to Mawman, Nov. 5, 1826.

His remaining works can only be slightly noticed. At the request of Bishop Milner, in 1823, he compiled the Lessons for the English Saints, which were afterwards approved and inserted in the "Breviary." His "Remarks on the 'St. Cuthbert' of the Rev. James Raine" were published in 1828, during the progress of the History. They were followed by his "Translation of the Four Gospels," printed in 1836 ; by his "Catechetical Instructions," which appeared in 1840 ; by his "Manual of Prayers for Sundays and Holidays," published at York in 1844 ;† and by various contributions to the "Catholic Magazine," "Dolman's Magazine," the "Dublin Review," and other periodicals.* In the mean time, the History, though completed, was still to undergo the revision of his maturer thought. Fortunately both for himself and for the world, he lived long enough not only to receive the suggestions of his friends, and become acquainted with whatever the ingenuity of his enemies could object, but also to derive instruction or support from those new sources of information, which the labours of modern research had opened since the appearance of his earlier volumes. Of all these aids he eagerly and anxiously availed himself. Thrice he diligently revised the whole work; and, in three successive and severally improved editions, gave to the world the result of these later studies. The last edition, from which the present reprint has been stereotyped, was published by Mr. Dolman, in 1849, in ten octavo volumes. It embodies the substance of all the recent disco-and therefore that we ought to remove every impediment, and hold out every allurement, consistently with our doctrines and necessary practices. I resolved, in consequence, to try whether a prayer-book might not be so composed, as not to offend the taste of men of education, and, at the same time, to present to them, in appearance undesignedly, arguments to reconcile them to our peculiar forms of worship. I made the experiment as to the Mass, at the same time assimilating the prayers of the people, as much as might be, to those of the priest, since both are offerers in their respective stations,—'Meum ac vestrum Sacrificium.' I afterwards added the prayers for Sundays, for the purpose of giving a new translation of the Gloria Patri, &c., and the Pater de cælis Deus, &c., and a new arrangement of psalms for the people,—selecting from different psalms such passages as are easily understood, and connecting them together, as is sometimes done in the graduals of the missal: for I think it folly to give them whole psalms to recite, nine-tenths of which it is not possible for them to understand."—It is in the published edition of 1844, that his beautiful translation of the Ave Mariæ Stella appears.

* To Mawman, Aug. 1, 1826.

† This, however, was only an enlargement of a smaller specimen, of which he had privately printed a few copies in 1833. Speaking of it in a letter to the present writer, in November of that year, he says,—“I wrote it some time ago, with the following view. Judging, from appearances, that the very foundations of the Established Church were crumbling beneath it, I inferred that we ought to throw wide open the portals of our own church, to receive such Protestants as may be willing to seek refuge within its walls ;

MEMOIR OF

* One paper published by him in the "Catholic Magazine," for January, 1841, on the subject of an ancient Christian Inscription, then lately discovered at Autun, is strikingly illustrative of his critical powers. Father Secchi, a Jesuit professor of Greek at Rome, had deciphered the inscription, and had attempted to restore such parts of it as were missing. The result of his labours was given to the world in a small pamphlet; and Dr. Wiseman, who adopted his interpretation, immediately noticed the work in an article in the "Dublin Review" (ix. 527). But Lingard was not satisfied. He saw that the conjectural restorations of the professor were open to a variety of objections: and he accordingly drew up a paper for the "Catholic Magazine," suggesting a different reading, and pointing out the mistakes of his predecessor. For simplicity and beauty, the interpretation of the historian will always, I think, be deemed far superior to that of the learned Italian.

veries connected with English history, and contains a large quantity of new and important matter.

It was the last literary effort of his great and powerful mind. In the notice which he prefixed to it, he had pathetically alluded to his declining health, and had told the public that "a long and painful malady, joined with the infirmities of age, had already admonished him to bid a final adieu to those studies, with which he had been so long familiar." He survived, however, more than two years, suffering intensely from an accumulation of maladies; but always cheerful, always resigned, always manifesting that vigour of intellect, that playfulness of thought, that kind, considerate, gentle disposition, which had endeared him through life to all who had possessed the happiness of his acquaintance. On Easter Sunday, 1851, he was out for the last time. He was walking in his garden in company with a friend; and, as if seized with a sudden presentiment of his approaching death, turned to his companion, and insisted on his then taking with him some young oak trees which he had raised from the acorns of a favourite tree,* and which were to be planted and preserved as memorials of him. On the following day, he became seriously ill, and took to his bed. During the months of May and June, he grew gradually worse; and, before the end of the latter, the hopes of his friends had almost disappeared. "Dr. Lingard's mind," writes one of them, Mrs. Thomas Lomax, on the 27th of June, "was more alive to a joke, and could follow out a conversation better yesterday than on the Friday previous: but what a comparison is that! Could we compare it with any Friday in last year, something might be said." For three weeks, however, he still continued to linger. As the hour approached, which was to terminate his earthly career, his mind, already withdrawn from the earth, became more intensely fixed on that future state to which he was hastening. With the humble confidence and the cheerful resignation of the Christian, he prepared himself for the great change: and on the 17th of

* This tree had been raised by him from an acorn, which he brought from the banks of Lake Trasemene, in 1817.

MEMOIR OF

July, 1851, having received all the rites of the Church, he calmly expired, in the eighty-first year of his age. By his own desire, his body was conveyed to Ushaw, where it was interred, with those of the bishops, and presidents of the house, in the cloister of the College cemetery.

Of the character of Dr. Lingard, in private life, the best eulogy will be found in the sorrows poured forth upon his grave. Endeared to all by the simplicity of his manners, by the benevolence of his disposition, and by the affectionate warmth of his heart, his death was deplored by those who knew him, almost as a domestic calamity; his loss was regarded as of one whose place could never be supplied. With his neighbours of every creed and of every shade of opinion, he lived in habits of familiar and unreserved intercourse. Ardently attached to his religion himself, imbued with a deep sense of the sanctity of its precepts, and the divine authority of its doctrines, he sought to extend its influence among others, not by the jarring elements of disputatious criticism, not by wounding the prejudices, or challenging the hostility, of his Protestant brethren, but by the innocence of his life, by the modesty of his demeanour, and by the exercise of all the calm, quiet, unobtrusive virtues, which adorn the character of the Christian. He was eminently the lover of peace, the promoter of charity, "in season and out of season." Writing to his amiable friend, Dr. Oliver, on one occasion, he says, "I shall be happy to receive your third volume, and rejoice greatly that you are proceeding successfully with your Monasticon of the Diocese of Exeter. I anticipate much benefit to religion from such labours as yours. They must bring you into company and familiarity with many Protestant clergymen, and thus contribute to moderate at least the bitterness of religious dissension; and, moreover, must silently operate on the prejudices of your Protestant readers. For my own part, I conceive that he who contributes to remove prejudices now, lays the groundwork of conversions hereafter: for prejudice in general indisposes Protestants, not only from yielding to argument, but even from listening to it."*

DR. LINGARD.

In conversation, among his more intimate friends, Dr. Lingard was the delight of all who heard him. The buoyancy of his mind, the playfulness of his wit, and the rich store of anecdote for ever at his command, gave to him a power over his companions which it was impossible to withstand. Connected with this subject, a ludicrous story is told among his friends. During the Northern Assizes, several of the leaders of the bar, among whom were Scarlett, Pollock, Brougham, and some others, were frequently in the habit of going over from Lancaster to Hornby, on a Sunday or other vacant day, to spend it with Lingard. As usual, one Sunday morning, before Mass, a party of them drove up to the house, and informed the servant that they intended to dine with the Doctor. In an agony of dismay, she ran to her master. The only leg of mutton which they had in the house had just been cut in two; and what could be done in a country village, where nothing more was to be procured? Lingard was not disturbed. "Sew the pieces together," said he, "and roast them as one: and I will take care that it is not discovered." She did so. The joint, thus repaired, was served up; and so entertained were the guests by his conversation, that the expedient passed off unobserved.

The modesty of Dr. Lingard, and his anxiety, on all occasions, to withdraw from public notice, were remarkable features in his character. Even when a youth at Douay, an accidental commendation from his tutor* once threw him into a state of such painful confusion, that the tutor never again ventured to praise him in his presence. To the frequency with which he was consulted on all matters of importance, and to the negotiation by which he obtained the restoration of the English College in Rome, I have already alluded. Of the bishops, there were few by whom his advice was not habitually sought. They applied to him in their difficulties; they asked his counsel in the various transactions in which they were engaged: but in no instance could they succeed in drawing him from his retirement; and in no case has he left an evidence to mark the share which he took in those affairs. It was the same with the English College in Rome. The negotiation for the recovery of that establishment, and for the restitution of its government to the secular clergy, was conducted by him in circumstances of no ordinary difficulty. It was a matter of the highest importance to religion, a transaction which conferred incalculable benefits on the clergy of this country: and yet, he was content to work in silence, in secret; to make no account of what he had effected, and, as far as he was personally concerned, to leave no trace of what he had accomplished. Among the papers which have been found since his death, there is no allusion to this subject; even the Diary kept by him, at the very moment, in Rome, is silent when it arrives at this point.

* The late Rev. R. Platt, of Puddington, in Cheshire.

MEMOIR OF

Allied to his modesty, and not, perhaps, unconnected with his simple and retiring habits, was that lofty principle of action, which raised Dr. Lingard so immeasurably above the views and expedients of the ordinary world. Too proud to solicit the favours, or to court the smiles, of the great, he placed his reliance upon the efforts of his own mind, and scorned to incur an obligation, which could even be thought to compromise his independence. I well remember, when, some years subsequent to the completion of the History, the failure of a certain banking-house in Lancashire was understood to have inflicted considerable injury on the neighbourhood, and, among other sufferers, on Dr. Lingard. The report of the disaster, and of its effects, particularly, on the finances of the historian, reached the ears of the duke of Norfolk. To relieve the difficulty of the moment, was the first impulse of the venerable nobleman: to devise the means of permanent assistance was the subject of his anxious deliberation. At first, it was proposed to assail the Government with urgent and general solicitations, from the Catholic peers, for an allowance from the pension list: afterwards, it was thought that such a proceeding might savour more of political intrigue than of a testimony to distinguished merit; and it was, therefore, resolved to supply from private contributions what it was deemed impolitic to seek from the public fund. Of the unqualified success of the scheme there was no doubt. The parties to subscribe were known; the sums to be produced were ready: and the consent of him, who was mainly interested in the result, was all that was required to give effect to the design. But that consent was not to be obtained. He was sensible, indeed, of the intended kindness: he was grateful for such a testimony of approbation and regard: but, while he appreciated the motive, he begged to decline the honour, and requested that the project might be abandoned. Of course, the idea of a subscription was at once laid aside; and nearly two years had elapsed, when, from another quarter, and in a different form, the subject was again revived. The following is Mr. Edward Blount's account of this interesting transaction. It is from a letter addressed by him to Dr. Lingard, in April, 1839:—

DR. LINGARD.

“I happened to call, as I frequently do, on Lord and Lady Holland. They were alone; and, in the course of conversation, Lady Holland remarked that some tribute ought to be paid to Dr. Lingard's literary merits; in which Lord Holland cordially concurred. I very naturally inquired how this was to be done:—‘By your seeing Lord Melbourne, and suggesting it to him.’ ‘But will Lord Holland pave the way?’ ‘Most undoubtedly; and so will I,’ said the lady. A few days after” [he had written to Lingard, and obtained his answer, in the interval] “I asked an audience of Lord Melbourne; Lord and Lady Holland having seen him. He received me in the most friendly manner, and expressed an anxious desire to enter on the subject. I told him plainly, and sans détour, that he must expect no solicitation from you, no plea of actual want; and that you would take nothing that was not voluntarily accorded. I read to him your letter to me; and he seemed doubtful what fund he could make available to our purpose: for it would seem that the Government pensions are, strictly speaking, eleemosynary, urgently pressed for, and accompanied by the earnest solicitations of friends, and the grossest exaggerations. He gave you full credit for the delicacy of your mode of proceeding, and said he would try what he could do, and that I should hear from him.

MEMOIR OF

"I repeated my visits to Holland House, and found them as active and anxious as I could wish them to be: and I saw Lord Melbourne again; and was, shortly after, informed by Lady Holland that something was to be done for you. The rest you know. The sum is too small" [it was 300*l.* granted from the privy purse of the queen]: "but allow me to say that if it be not larger, the blame falls on Dr. Lingard, who was too high-minded to canvass and supplicate, and thus to become regularly qualified for the pension list."

Combined with his modesty and independence, there was, in the composition of Dr. Lingard's character, that peculiar strength of mind, which, firm in the consciousness of its own integrity, enabled him to look with calmness, and almost with indifference, on the attacks of his various assailants. With the single exception of the reply to Dr. Allen, he was never induced to take formal notice of the charges of his adversaries: even the efforts of his enemies to impeach his character at Rome were unable to disturb his composure, or engage him in any measures of defence. Of one person, indeed, and in private, he would sometimes speak in terms of painful and pathetic complaint;—"For some reason or other, he persecuted my father till his death, and since, has persecuted me!" But the pang called forth no external effort. The tear, that started at the recollection of his father, was wiped away; and he left his own wrongs to vindicate themselves. Writing to a friend, in October, 1823, two years before his interview with Pope Leo, and before the offer of that Pontiff to provide for him in Rome, he thus refers to some recent proceedings of the person in question:—"As for myself and ———, I can tell you but little. On the 4th of August, Mr. White, the locum-tenens for Dr. Gradwell, was desired to send the volumes of my history to the Propaganda, and to call himself in the course of the day. There he was shown a long letter from ———, and permitted to extract three passages; those, I suppose, of chief importance. 1st.—A false translation of that, in which I say the mind of St. Thomas became gradually tinged with enthusiasm. 2nd.—One in which I say that the apostasy of Ridley was severely chastised by Bradford. 3rd.—And another in which ——— asserts that I praise Cranmer for his arguments against the mass. Mr. White wrote a memorial in defence of the book.....However, I have desired Mr. Gradwell not to take up the business at all. If the Propagandists have time for such trifles, they have the book: let them read and judge for themselves.”

In another letter, written in February, 1829, he tells the following story:—“ A curious intrigue respecting myself has lately come to my knowledge. A severe critique on my history, in which I am described as the most dangerous enemy who has assailed the rights of the Church in the present century, was sent from Rome last autumn, and published in the Mémorial Catholique, printed in Paris. In December, the same critique, but purporting to be a translation in Italian, and printed without license, with Bastia in the title-page, was furtively circulated in Rome, and communicated to every person of consequence in that city. Dr. Baines and Dr. Wiseman have written, wishing me to answer it. That I cannot do, because I have never seen it, and will not do, because I think it not worth the trouble. They do not know who the author of the critique is, or that it was originally written in Rome. That I discovered by the following means. Another critique, with a confidential letter, was sent to the editor of the ‘Quotidienne,’ in January, signed Ventura. The editor, instead of publishing it, sent me a copy. Padre Ventura is a Theatine, Ultramontaniste enragé, whom the Pope, on account of his extravagant opinions, removed from the chair of Jurisprudence in the Sapienza, two or three years ago.”*

* The following is Dr. Gradwell’s account of Ventura and his principles: “ There is at Rome, as well as in France and elsewhere, a faction of Catholic zealots, ultras in every thing,—in divinity, in ethics, metaphysics, history, and law. They lay down abstract principles, and then draw from them the most extravagant conclusions. As Hutchinsonians lay it down that all wisdom is in the Bible, and hence expatiate into wild conclusions; so these lay it down as a maxim, that church authority and Catholic truth are everything in science. All the rest is infidelity and atheism. The head of these

MEMOIR OF

It remains to speak of Dr. Lingard's literary character. To a mind of singular clearness and rapidity in its perceptions he added an exhaustless energy of thought, a diligence and activity that were never unemployed. His industry was untiring. Ever ready to impart his knowledge and render assistance to others, he was addressed from all quarters, and on every subject, for information. As his reputation increased, these applications became proportionably more numerous. The scholars of the continent joined with those of his own country in seeking the aid of his learning or his advice; and post after post brought evidence of the estimation in which he was universally held. Hence, a large addition to the labours inseparable from his own studies was entailed upon him. To answer these letters alone required no inconsiderable portion of his time. Yet his assiduity was always equal to the task.

at Rome is a Theatine from Palermo, Padre Ventura. He is a great metaphysician and prolific writer. About 1825, the Pope, who had heard that Ventura was a great man in his way, invited him to Rome, and gave him a professor's chair at the Sapienza. He dictated his course. One volume was printed: I believe the imprimatur was refused to the second. The book was that of a mountebank; and his lectures were laughed at by the young, as buffoonery. Men of reflection thought that he was not only revolutionizing philosophy, but (and this was my own opinion) undermining religion. I am sorry that I had such contempt for his system and extravagancies, that I cannot now trust myself to report them. I think he defined man to be intellectus organizatus, or substantia spiritualis corpore induta. He represents the British Government as a perfect monster, and the worst of all governments. The church is the fountain of power: then kings follow, who derive their power from the church. Less perfect, and further from religion, are limited monarchies; because part of the authority, which the monarch derived from the church, is withheld by others. Less perfect still are republics, which have less of the principle of original authority, and more consequently of infidelity, in their construction. But the English constitution is rebellion against the ecclesiastical principle, and consequently atheistical. After holding his chair one year, the Pope was obliged to discharge him. Ventura was hooted by men of sense; but yet he had, and still has, a party in Rome, even among some of the less wise cardinals. The late Cardinal Spina and Cardinal Zurla had just notions about this man's quackery." (Letter to Lingard, January 23, 1829.)—I need only add, that he is the same Ventura, who, twenty years later, as the follower of Mazzini, and the companion of Gavazzi, so disgracefully distinguished himself amidst the excesses of the republican party in Rome: and that Dr. Wiseman, in the letter to which Lingard alludes above, describes his pamphlet as "the driveling of a mad ultra," which Lingard "could answer in an hour." (Letter to Dr. Gradwell, January 4, 1829.) It was entitled "Osservazioni nella Storia d' Inghilterra del Dottore Lingard, dirette in forma di Lettera al Sign. Editore del Memoriale Cattolico."

DR. LINGARD.

To each subject presented to him his attention was cheerfully directed ; and to each correspondent, however humble or however remote, a reply was punctually returned.

To assist the industry of Dr. Lingard, he possessed an ease and rapidity of composition, rarely equalled, and hardly ever excelled. It was late one Saturday night, during the progress of the Durham Controversy, when he received the pamphlet entitled, "A Protestant's Reply," by Elijah Index (Mr. Coates, of Bedlington) ; on the following Monday morning, before six o'clock, his "Review" of this pamphlet was on its way to Newcastle to be printed. "I know this," writes the Rev. Robert Hogarth, "from having been his amanuensis on the occasion. He dictated the greater part, without notes, much faster than I could write ; and the whole production went to press without one solitary alteration : and yet, both of us were in attendance at our respective duties (in the college) on Sunday, as if nothing of the kind was going on."—Another anecdote, connected with the first appearance of his "Anglo-Saxon Antiquities," is familiar among his friends. The work had been sent to the press, and the first volume had been actually printed, when Lingard, in the remote solitude of Crook Hall, for the first time obtained a copy of the later volumes of Mr. Sharon Turner's publication on the same subject. The discoveries of Turner rendered a revisal of the work necessary. He therefore applied himself to the task at once ; and actually re-wrote the whole of the second volume, without stopping the press for a single day. Of the astonishing rapidity with which some of the earlier volumes of his History were written, we have his own account, in a letter addressed to Mr. Kirk, in December, 1823. Kirk had written to him, enclosing the strictures of some unnamed friend upon the History ; and Lingard, in reply to one of these strictures, says :—"I am as much, perhaps more, dissatisfied with the style than he is. But style is become with me a secondary object. The task I have imposed on myself of taking nothing on credit, but of going to the original author, is so laborious, that I have no time to throw away on the graces of style. Of this you will be convinced, when I tell you, what I have never yet mentioned to any one, that, in March, 1818, when I made the agreement with Mawman, I had written only to the end of Edward II. I agreed to go to press in October following: so that, in the course of seven months, I had to look over all I had written, to make numerous additions, and to compose the lives of the succeeding monarchs (to the end of Henry VII.). This I did, so as not to stop the press an hour: but it was a greater labour than I ever underwent in my life; nor would I have done it, had I not found that, unless I fixed a time, I should never get through. Hence, I attended little to style; and hence, I am convinced, there must be omissions and occasional inaccuracies."

MEMOIR OF

As a polemical and controversial writer, it is but trifling praise to say that Dr. Lingard stands immeasurably above every other Catholic author of the same class in England. For elegance of style, for felicity of illustration, for all the lighter graces of composition, united with that clear, calm, analytic power which at once seizes and destroys the argument of an opponent, his Tracts in the Durham Controversy, and his other shorter effusions, may fairly challenge comparison with any similar productions. His Catechetical Instructions are a masterly abridgment of the whole body of moral and controversial divinity; and his Introduction to the translation of the Four Gospels embodies an argument so clear, so simple, and so convincing, as to be fairly irresistible. In its peculiar class, it is, perhaps, the happiest effort of his genius. That any person, sincerely desirous of the truth, and seriously perusing this Introduction, should remain contented to receive the Scripture as the sole rule of faith, is hardly, I think, within the range of possibility.

But it is in connection with his History that the name of Dr. Lingard will take its place in the literary annals of future ages. Of this great work it may be fearlessly asserted, that it is at once the most complete, the most unbiassed, and therefore the most perfect, of all the histories of this country that have ever yet appeared. In the mere accessory of style, indeed, it is possible that, with all its classical purity and simplicity, it may still be deficient in that energy which it is fashionable to ascribe to the writings of Hume: but, in all those higher qualities which adorn and dignify a history,—in the fulness of its details, in the lucid arrangement of its parts, in the dramatic grouping of its characters, in deep research, in patient investigation, in the power to elicit, and the honesty to state, the truth, it rises far superior to the work of the great Scottish historian. In impartiality it stands alone. Never did a writer come forward more fearlessly to expose error, and, by the simple power of truth, to destroy the theories, and dissipate the prejudices, of ages. When Dr. Lingard conceived the idea of this work, he was not insensible to the difficulties by which such an undertaking would be surrounded. He was a Catholic and a clergyman: he knew that his motives would be suspected, and that his statements would be received with mistrust. To the disadvantages of his position was added the arduous nature of the task which he had assigned to himself. Hitherto, history had, in a great measure, been taken upon trust. Writer had followed after writer in the same track, and fiction had almost acquired the substance of reality. To remove these impediments; to gain the ear, and secure the confidence, of the public; to overthrow the vast fabric which falsehood had erected, and prejudice had continued to uphold, was the important enterprise in which, with a full knowledge of its difficulties, and a firm resolution to meet them with truth, with candour, and with impartiality, he was about to embark. In a letter to Mr. Kirk, he thus explains his views and feelings on this subject:—"Through the work, I made it a rule to tell the truth, whether it made for or against us; to avoid all appearance of controversy, that I might not repel Protestant readers; and yet to furnish every necessary proof in our favour, in the notes: so that, if you compare my narrative with Hume's, for example, you will find that, with the aid of the notes, it is a complete refutation of him, without appearing to be so. This I thought preferable. In my account of the Reformation, I must say much to shock Protestant prejudices; and my only chance of being read by Protestants depends on my having the reputation of a temperate writer. The good to be done, is by writing a book which Protestants will read."*—And, in a subsequent letter to the same person, he adds,—“Your friend thinks I should have occasionally assumed a tone of piety, and betrayed something more of a bias towards the Catholic cause. I think, that, if I wished to do good, I ought to have written as an indifferent spectator. Time and experience must decide between us. Should their verdict be against me, no one will deplore my misjudgment more than myself.”†

DR. LINGARD.

MEMOIR OF

Of the wisdom of these sentiments it would be impossible to entertain a doubt. Until the appearance of his History, the Protestant mind was, in a great measure, inaccessible to argument. It had its own views, its own prepossessions, its own distorted facts and doubtful conclusions: and every effort, professedly directed to the removal of its prejudices, had, in general, only tended to confirm them. But he induced his countrymen to read. He taught them to think, to doubt, to inquire: and the process thus commenced, led, in its results, to all that we have since witnessed. “I succeeded,” he says, in one of his letters, “in awakening the curiosity of some minds in the universities, in provoking doubts of the accuracy of their preconceived opinions, in creating a conviction that such opinions were unfounded. The spirit of inquiry was excited: it made gradual progress; and led, in the result, to that movement which we have seen.....I know that it was thus the favourable spirit of inquiry was generated in the universities.”‡ So early as the year 1825, all this was perceived and fully understood at Rome. “Your History,” writes Dr. Gradwell, in the April of that year, “is much spoken of in Rome, as one of the great causes which have wrought such a change in public sentiment, in England, on Catholic matters.” In Germany, the same fact was acknowledged and illustrated. Writing to Lingard, in July, 1835, Dr. Wiseman says, “I arrived in town last Monday, from Antwerp, after a very pleasant journey through Germany. At Munich, I was particularly delighted with the

* December 18, 1819.

† December 10, 1820.

‡ To Dolman, November 13, 1850.

DR. LINGARD.

society of the professors, among whom I spent several days. They all desired me, again and again, to assure you of the high esteem they entertain for you, and the high position your work is universally allowed; through all Germany, among historical productions. Professor Phillips, formerly professor of history at Baden, now at Munich, requested me to inform you that he owes his conversion (which made immense sensation, on account of his well-known talents), chiefly to your History, which he undertook to review." And a few weeks only before the death of the venerable historian, the same eminent prelate thus affectionately acknowledged his own personal obligations, and expressed his own opinion of his merits:—"Be assured," he says, "of my affectionate gratitude to you for much kindness in my early youth, and, still more, for the great, important, and noble services which you have rendered to religion through life, and which have so much contributed to overthrow error, and give a solid historical basis to all subsequent controversy with Protestantism."

To such evidences of the practical effects and beneficial results of the great work in question, it were needless to add anything. Yet, there is one letter which it would be scarcely pardonable to omit, and one testimony which is too important to be passed over without notice. The letter, which I shall insert first, is addressed to the historian by Archbishop Curtis, and describes the opinion entertained by the great body of the bishops and clergy in Ireland, not only of the general merits of the History, but also of those particular passages which the jealousy or the resentment of an enemy had selected as the objects of attack.

"DROGHEDA, 31st March, 1826.

"Very Rev. and dear Dr. Lingard,

"* * * * * When I mentioned to you above, that I should not be surprised if you yourself had been asked some questions at Rome relative to your works, I recollected that a good friend of yours and mine ——* had written me, some years back, a very serious letter, recommending to me and my brethren here to examine your History, and declare what qualification certain passages in it deserved, particularly those concerning St. Thomas of Canterbury, with some others; as also the tone you assumed, so different from all others that preceded you in the same line. My answer was, that we all, with our clergy, and most of our educated laity, have read, approved, and admired your History: that your opinion expressed of St. Thomas acknowledges him as a learned, zealous, and holy prelate, and, in fine, a glorious martyr: that he had acted sincerely, and as he thought himself in duty bound, according to the ecclesiastical laws of his time, and the circumstances in which he was engaged: but that many learned and unprejudiced men, as well then as ever since, did not think he was always right, either in the substance, or stern and inflexible manner, of some part of his conduct towards Henry II.: that no greater tribute of respect than this was due or paid to any of the Holy Fathers or ancient Saints, since the days of the Apostles: that, without that tone of impartiality adopted by you, there would be no chance of your being read, or gaining the confidence of our separated brethren, by whom your work was highly esteemed: and, in fine, that it had already done, and was doing, so much good everywhere, that we considered ourselves bound to recommend it earnestly to all the faithful. This answer seemed to settle the business. ———, in his frequent letters to me, never mentioned it any more. * *

* The author of the letters and memorials to Rome, against Dr. Lingard, mentioned in page 24, ante.

MEMOIR OF

“ I remain, my dear Sir,

“ Your most obedient Servant,

✠ “ P. CURTIS.”

The testimony to which I have alluded is no less than that of Pope Leo XII. It was in the autumn of the year 1828, as the reader is aware, that the intrigue of Ventura to ruin the reputation of the History was set on foot. In December, the pamphlet put forth by that writer appeared in Rome. It was placed under the knockers, or left in the halls and passages, of the principal residences in the city. Every means to circulate it was employed, every artifice to enforce its statements and render it effective was adopted. Among the nobility and gentry, in the colleges, with the Cardinals and other dignitaries, the emissaries of the party were at work: and even the Pontiff himself was besieged by their importunity, and assured of the dangerous character of the historian's writings.—And what was the result?—When Dr. Baines, then in Rome, next visited the Pope, he found, as Dr. Wiseman expresses it, “that though his ear had been attempted, it had not been poisoned.”* They conversed together on the subject of the History. They spoke of “the objects of the historian, of the necessity of writing with great moderation and exemption from party feeling,” of the wisdom of a plan, which, discarding the character, enabled the writer more effectually to discharge the office, of an apologist. Leo saw, and felt, and acknowledged the merits of the History; and, referring to its assailants—he wound up the discussion with this significant and instructive remark—“Why,” said he, “these gentlemen seem not to reflect either upon the times or the places in which the history was written.”†—Such was the declared opinion of Pope Leo XII.

That Dr. Lingard was specially raised up by Providence as an instrument for the execution of its own beneficent designs, there can be little doubt. A mighty movement was to be made. The light was to be separated from the darkness, and the minds of many were to be illumined. Controvertists had already essayed their powers, and had failed. Berington and Potts, Milner, and many others, had in vain employed the arms supplied by history for the defence of their own Church, and in opposition to the favourite prejudices of Protestantism. Lingard, therefore, came to pursue a different course from that of his predecessors. They had appeared as advocates—he was an unimpassioned narrator: they had avowedly argued for a victory—he simply stated the case that was before him: they had drawn their own conclusions, and exhibited their own views—he allowed the narrative to tell its own tale, to make its own impression, and to suggest the inferences that would naturally arise from it. It was in the contemplation of all this, and as if in scornful rebuke of the petty assaults which ignorance or malice have at times attempted, that Cardinal Wiseman, in a late number of the Dublin Review (xxxv. 205), thus speaks of the departed historian:—

* Letter to Dr. Gradwell, January 4, 1829.

† Dr. Baines to Lingard, January 3, 1829.

MEMOIR OF

“It is a Providence that, in history, we have had given to the nation a writer like Lingard, whose gigantic merit will be better appreciated in each successive generation, as it sees his work standing calm and erect amidst the shoals of petty pretenders to usurp his station. When Hume shall have fairly taken his place among the classical writers of our tongue, and Macaulay shall have been transferred to the shelves of romancers and poets, and each shall thus have received his true meed of praise, then Lingard will be still more conspicuous, as the only impartial historian of our country. This is a mercy indeed; and rightful honour to him, who, at such a period of time, worked his way, not into a high rank, but to the very loftiest point, of literary position.”

I cannot more appropriately conclude this Memoir, than by inserting the following beautiful letter, beautiful in the spirit which it breathes, and honourable alike to Lingard and to its author. It was addressed to the historian, in 1845, by Mr. Sharon Turner; and, together with the generosity of a high-minded opponent, exhibits so much benevolence of feeling, so much kindness of heart, and affecting simplicity of purpose, that, whatever may be thought of the religious question to which it alludes, its appearance in this place, as the crowning testimony to the merits of the Catholic historian, can scarcely fail to be acceptable to the reader.

COTTAGE, WINCHMORE HILL, MIDDLESEX, 28th April, 1845.”

“Reverend Sir,

“Having just received the new edition of your ‘Anglo Saxon Church Antiquities,’ and the last of your ‘History of England,’ which I had ordered from my bookseller, to have your latest views and corrections before me, I cannot refrain from expressing to you how much I am pleased with their publication, and that you have lived, and been able, to continue your larger work so far beyond the period, at which a disabling illness, which has never since left me, compelled me to pause in mine. It had been always my determination to write only from original, and, where possible, from contemporary sources, as I could procure them. But the search after these, and their examination, required a bodily strength and activity, which I no longer enjoyed ; and therefore I have been obliged to turn my attention to other subjects, which I could pursue in my private study, as it was never my design to repeat from others what they had already given to the world.

DR. LINGARD.

“ Differently educated, and in a different position of life from yourself, with duties, habits, and feelings as diverging, it is natural, indeed inevitable, that we should take our different views, and draw different conclusions on those subjects, and on the incidents connected with them, which individually interested us ; and yet each seek for, and only mean to state, what appeared to us to be the right opinion and historical truth about them. I am persuaded that we have been both actuated by these motives, and that our social world may have been benefited by our doing so. It is fair and just to mankind, that they should have the fullest representations of the whole truth, on every topic in which their welfare is concerned ; and therefore that they should be possessed of the statements and convictions of such an intelligent Roman Catholic writer as yourself, as well as of those which I, or any of our Church, may present to them. These contrasts prevent their being led to misconceptions by any partial or one-sided narrative, or by the tendency towards it, that often comes so involuntarily and unconsciously over every author ; and sometimes most strongly from his very sincerity and conscientious zeal to depict what he deems true. On these grounds I thank you for what you have published, and am myself much gratified that you have fulfilled your chosen task with so much research and ability ; and I shall use your works to guard my own mind from any undue partiality, or wilful mistake, in the dissimilar impressions which the important topics we both investigate must yet unavoidably occasion severally to us,—as fellow-labourers (for there is no spirit of rivalry between us) in our important public work, pursued by both as a public duty, or at least with the hope of some public utility. Let us continue to do so, without any unfriendly feeling toward each other!

MEMOIR OF

“ You will excuse the liberty I take in expressing these feelings to you; but as, in my seventy-seventh year, I cannot, with my infirmities of body, expect to be much longer here, it is gratifying to me, while I live, to intimate to you my literary esteem and appreciation of your intelligent and valuable contributions to our national history. Though I deeply regret some errors, as I cannot but consider them, in your Church, it has in it, and has preserved, sacred truths, for which Christianity is much indebted to it, and for which, though I am no Tractarian, I greatly venerate it. Of course, I wish it had only such: but I have, during my younger life, been intimate with many Roman Catholics, and with some of their clergy, whom I have had reason highly to esteem; and therefore I see with pleasure that the policy of our present Government inclines to give to them an equitable share of its amicable attentions.

“ Both churches may exist in harmony and national security, and without danger to each other; for it is impossible that either can now destroy the other. Men of great intellect and virtue, science and learning, continue to profess and to arise in yours, finding it congenial with their minds and sensibilities, as they abound also in ours. That this number may increase, I am glad to see every measure adopted that will improve the education, and elevate and enlarge the minds of the sacred teachers of both,—believing that all will become happier and better as such true opinions and views become naturalized in each, whatever particular modifications or disciplines they may respectively prefer.

“ As I happen to be, at this moment, publishing a little poem, in illustration of my views of the more probable character of our Richard III. than Shakespear has made popular, I beg your acceptance of the enclosed copy, as a testimony of my personal respect and literary esteem, and beg to remain, “ Rev. Sir, with all proper consideration,

DR. LINGARD.

Yours most faithfully and obediently,

“ SHARON TURNER.

“ Rev. Dr. Lingard.”

LINGARD'S PLACE, CLAXBY, LINCOLNSHIRE.

A LIST OF THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

VOLUME I.

Portrait of Author, to face Title View of "Lingard's Place," at end of Memoir
Caractacus before Ostorius, the Roman General	Page 23
Cædwalla granting the site of a Church to St. Wilfrid.. ..	85
Alfred presenting Gothrun for baptism, A.D. 878	108
The Saxon Leaders submit to William, A.D. 1066	220
The Burial of William the Conqueror forbidden by Fitz-Arthur ..	255

VOLUME II.

The Barons at St. Edmondsbury swearing to obtain the Great Charter, to face Title.
The Meeting between Henry II. and Philip Augustus at Tours ..	118
Richard I. refuses to look on the Holy City, since he cannot deliver it from the Infidels	133
Loss of the Treasure in the Passage of the Wash by King John, A.D. 1216.. ..	186

VOLUME III.

Edward the Black Prince intercedes for the Spanish Prisoners, to face Title.
Murder of Lord Stafford at York.. ..	157
Sir W. Gascoigne refuses to pass sentence on Archbishop Scrope ..	217

VOLUME IV.

Death of Talbot and Lord Lisle at Chatillon, to face Title.
The Meeting of Henry and Margaret after the Battle of St. Albans ..	65
Katherine of Arragon before Henry VIII.	256
Arrival of Cardinal Wolsey at the Abbey of Leicester	264

VOLUME V.

Marriage of Philip and Mary at Winchester, to face Title.
--	--

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS.

VOLUME VI.

Escape of Mary Queen of Scots from Lochleven Castle, to face Title.
Death Warrant read to Mary Queen of Scots	..	..	..	Page 225
Destruction of the Spanish Armada	..	..	..	250

VOLUME VII.

Charles I. sets up his Standard at Nottingham, to face Title.
Funeral of Lady Arabella Stuart.	..	..	..	63
Prince Charles and Philip IV. at Madrid	..	..	..	122

VOLUME VIII.

The Landing of Charles II. at Dover, to face Title.
Escape of Charles II. after the Battle of Worcester	..	...	..	156
Oliver Cromwell refusing the Title of King	..	..	..	250

VOLUME IX.

Titus Oates before the Privy Council, to face Title.

NOTE.—At the upper end of the table sits Charles II. Next to him, standing, is Henry Bennet, earl of Arlington, lord chamberlain. At the table, on the king's right, are, 1. James, duke of York; 2. Prince Rupert; 3. Thomas Osborne, earl of Danby, lord high treasurer; 4. Arthur Annesley, earl of Anglesea, privy seal; 5. William, earl of Craven, lord-lieutenant of Middlesex and colonel of the Coldstream Guards.

On the king's left are, 1. William Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury; 2. Heneage, Lord Finch, lord chancellor; 3. Henry Compton, bishop of London; 4. Christopher Monk, duke of Albemarle, captain of the Life Guard.

At the foot of the table stands Titus Oates, and behind him Dr. Tonge. All the above, except the last named, are from portraits.

Lord Stafford led to Execution	..	..	..	..	248
--------------------------------	----	----	----	----	-----

VOLUME X.

Escape of the Queen of James II., to face Title.

CONTENTS

OF

THE FIRST VOLUME.

CHAPTER I. ROMAN BRITAIN.

Cæsar twice invades Britain—The British Tribes—Their Manners—Religion—Government—Gradual Conquest of Britain by the Romans—Its State under the Emperors—Conversion of the Natives to Christianity—The Romans abandon the Island.

Cæsar's first invasion of Britain	11	The government established in
His return to Gaul	12	Britain	28
The second invasion	ib.	The prefect	ib.
Resistance of Cassibelan ..	13	Procurator and taxes ..	29
And his submission	14	Army	ib.
Origin of the Britons	ib.	Provinces	30
British tribes	15	Colonies	ib.
Their manners	16	Municipia	31
Discovery of the Tin Islands ..	17	Latian cities	ib.
Exports and imports	ib.	Stipendiary towns	ib.
Religion	18	Roman walls	ib.
Sacrifices	19	Vallum of Hadrian	ib.
Doctrines	20	Vallum of Antoninus	32
Authority of the Druids	21	Ulpian Marcellus	ib.
The bards	ib.	Clodius Albinus	ib.
Government of the Britons ..	ib.	Virius Lupus	33
Augustus	22	Severus in Britain	ib.
Caligula	ib.	Grants peace to the Caledonians	ib.
Claudius	23	Builds his celebrated wall ..	34
Ostorius	ib.	He dies	ib.
Fate of Caractacus	24	Usurpation of Carausius ..	35
Reduction of Anglesey	25	His death	ib.
Rebellion of Boadicea	ib.	Reign of Allectus	ib.
Defeat of Boadicea	26	His death	ib.
Victories of Agricola	27	Introduction of Christianity ..	36
He invades Caledonia	ib.	Conversion of Lucius	ib.

Persecution	37	Usurpation of Maximus	41
Constantine emperor	38	He is slain	ib.
Government of Britain	ib.	Marcus, Gratian, and Constantine emperors	42
Tyranny of Paulus	39	Britain abandoned by the Romans	ib.
Export of corn from Britain	ib.	The natives invite the Saxons	43
Origin of the Picts and Scots	ib.	Theological disputes	44
Theodosius	41

CHAPTER II.

ANGLO-SAXONS.

Origin and Character of the Anglo-Saxons—Their repeated Descents in Britain—They found Eight distinct Kingdoms—The Natives retire to the Western Coast—Reigns of the Saxon Bretwaldas—Ælla—Ceawlin—Ethelbert—Redwald—Edwin—Oswald—Oswio.

Original country of the Saxons	44	Redwald, Bretwalda IV. :—
Their manners	45	Reign of Redwald	56
Arms	ib.	Conquests of Edilfrid	ib.
Ships	ib.	Adventures of Edwin	57
Foundation of the kingdom of Kent	46	Death of Edilfrid	ib.
British fictions	47	Edwin, Bretwalda V. :—
Sussex	48	Reign of Edwin	58
Wessex	ib.	His marriage	ib.
Essex	ib.	Attempt to assassinate Edwin	ib.
East Anglia	49	His revenge and conversion	59
Bernicia	ib.	Edwin's power	60
Deira	ib.	His death	ib.
Mercia	ib.	Sufferings of the Northumbrians	ib.
Conduct of the Britons	50	Oswald, Bretwalda VI. :—
Their chieftains	51	Murder of the Northumbrians	61
Effects of the Saxon conquests	ib.	Accession of Oswald	ib.
Octarchy established	52	Conversion of the Northumbrians	62
Ælla, Bretwalda I. :—		Death of Oswald	ib.
Reign of Ælla	ib.	Oswio, Bretwalda VII. :—
Ceawlin, Bretwalda II. :—		Reign of Oswio	63
Reign of Ceawlin	ib.	Murder of Oswio	ib.
Ethelbert, Bretwalda III. :—		Enmity of Penda	64
Reign of Ethelbert	53	Defeat and death of Penda	65
Conversion of the men of Kent	ib.	Dedication of Elfreda	ib.
Ethelbert baptized	54	Power of Oswio	ib.
Conversion of Essex	ib.	Religious disputes	66
Controversy with the Britons	55	Uniformity established	ib.
Laws of Ethelbert	ib.	Yellow plague	67
Reign of Eadbald	56	Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury	68
		Death of Oswio	ib.

CONTENTS.

v

CHAPTER III.

ANGLO-SAXONS.

Kings of Northumbria—Of Mercia—Ethelbald—Offa—Cenulf—Of Wessex—Ceadwalla—Ina—Cynewulf—Egbert—Ethelwulf—Ethelbald—Ethelbert—Ethelred.

Northumbria :—		Is opposed by pretenders to the crown	87
Northumbrian kings	69	Founds monasteries	ib.
Egfrid's wars and death.. ..	70	Resigns the crown—Goes to Rome—Dies	88
Aldfrid	71	Æthelheard—Cuthred	ib.
Succession of Northumbrian kings	ib.	Sigebrycht is deposed	89
Notice of Bede	74	Cynewulf is murdered	ib.
Of Alcuin	ib.	Punishment of the murderers ..	90
Mercia :—		Brihtic is poisoned by his queen—her fate	ib.
Mercian kings : Wulphere ..	75	Egbert :—
Ethelred	ib.	Egbert subdues the Britons ..	91
Cænred	ib.	The Mercians	ib.
Ceolfred	76	The Northumbrians	ib.
Ethelbald	77	The Danes and Northmen ..	92
Offa	ib.	Their descents	ib.
His victories	ib.	Death of Egbert	ib.
Archbishopric of Lichfield ..	78	Ethelwulf :—
Offa and Charlemagne	79	Succession of Ethelwulf	93
Murder of Ethelbert of East Anglia.. ..	80	Danish invasions	ib.
Offa's death	ib.	Ethelwulf assists the Mercians ..	94
Egferth	ib.	Grants a liberal donation to the church	ib.
Cenulf deposes Eadbert of Kent	81	Visits Rome	95
Restores the prerogatives of Canterbury	ib.	Ethelbald rebels	ib.
Persecutes Archbishop Wulfrid..	ib.	Pacification	96
Kenelm murdered	82	Ethelwulf dies	ib.
Ceolwulf	ib.	Ethelbald :—
Wessex :—		Ethelbald marries his mother-in-law	ib.
Kings of Wessex : Ceolwulf ..	83	His death	97
Death of Tewdric of Wales ..	ib.	Ethelbert :—
Cynegils and Cuichelm	ib.	Adventures of Ragnar Lodbrog ..	ib.
Coinwalch	ib.	His death by Ælla	ib.
Expelled and restored	84	Ethelred :—
Sexburga	ib.	Invasion by the sons of Ragnar ..	98
Ceadwalla	ib.	They conquer Northumbria ..	ib.
In Sussex	85	Invade Mercia	99
Made king of Wessex	ib.	Plunder and destroy the churches ..	ib.
Conquers the Isle of Wight ..	ib.	Enter East Anglia	ib.
Puts to death the brothers of Arvald'.. ..	ib.	Murder King Edmund	ib.
Loses his brother in Kent—Goes to Rome—Is baptized—Dies ..	86	Invade Wessex	100
Ina publishes a code of laws ..	ib.	Death of Ethelred	ib.
Invades Kent and Cornwall ..	87

CHAPTER IV.

ANGLO-SAXONS.

Birth, Education, and Accession of Alfred—Successes of the Danes—Alfred opposes them by Sea—His Victories, Laws, and Improvements—Reigns of Edward—Athelstan—Edmund—And Edred.

Alfred the Great :—	Ecclesiastical affairs	120
Birth of Alfred	Athelstan, the first monarch of
His education	England :—
His malady	Succession of Athelstan	ib.
His succession to the crown	Tale about the mother of Athel-
Purchases peace	stan	ib.
Danes conquer Mercia	Alfred aspires to the crown	121
Pillage north of the Tyne	Athelstan takes possession of Inva ^d e Wessex	Northumbria	ib.
Alfred builds a fleet	Extends his authority over the Faults in the character of Alfred	Britons	122
He is driven from his throne	Death of his brother Edwin	ib.
Submission of Wessex	Scots rebel and submit	123
A party of Danes defeated	Invasion of Anlaff	ib.
Alfred reappears	Victory of Brunanburgh	124
Fights with the Danes	Power of Athelstan	ib.
Is victorious	He protects foreign princes	125
Alfred's improvements in the army
The fortifications	Haco of Norway	ib.
The navy	Alan of Bretagne	ib.
The administration of justice	Louis of France	ib.
He encourages learping	Marriages of his sisters	126
His translations	Ethilda	ib.
Arrangement of his time	Editha	ib.
Of his finances	Ediva	ib.
His power	Elgiva	ib.
Invasion by Hastings	Athelstan's death	ib.
Who retires to France	Manners	127
The war continues	Charities	ib.
Its termination	Laws	ib.
Battles by sea
Death of Alfred	Edmund :—
Edward :—	Northumbrian princes	128
Ethelwald aspires to the crown	Anlaff's success	ib.
And perishes in battle	His death	ib.
Edward takes possession of	Edmund conquers Northumbria	ib.
Mercia	And Cumbria	ib.
Attacks the northern Danes	Edmund's death	129
Success of Edward and Ethel-	Edred succeeds	ib.
fed	Edred :—
Edward pursues his success	Final subjection of the Northum-
Dies	brians	130
His family	Account of Turketul	ib.
Eadburga	And of Dunstan	131
Edward fortifies the burghs	Edred's death	ib.

CONTENTS.

vii

CHAPTER V. ANGLO-SAXONS.

Reign of Edwy—Edgar—Edward the Martyr—Ethelred—And Edmund, Sur-named Ironside.

Edwy :—		Ethelred :—
His misconduct	132	Ethelred succeeds	142
His amour with Ethelgive ..	ib.	Invasions and ravages of the
Her banishment	133	Northmen	143
Revolt of the Mercians	ib.	Treason of Elfric	144
Edwy's death	134	Sweyn and Olave	145
Edgar :—		Other invasions	ib.
Edgar's infancy	ib.	Ethelred marries Emma ..	146
He recalls Dunstan	ib.	Massacre of the Danes	ib.
Becomes king of Wessex	135	Revenge by Sweyn	147
Surnamed the Peaceful	ib.	Exertions of Ethelred	ib.
Pleases the Northumbrians ..	ib.	Invasion by Thurchil	148
Divides their territory	136	Distress of the English	149
Permits them to make their own		Taxation	ib. laws	ib.	Last invasion by Sweyn	150
His naval expeditions	ib.	Flight of Ethelred	151
His power	137	Death of Sweyn	ib.
Administration of justice	ib.	Return of Ethelred	ib.
The restoration of the monks ..	138	Invasion by Canute	152
The reform of the clergy	139	Death of Ethelred	153
Edgar's magnificence	ib.	Edmund :—
His courage	140	Siege of London	154
His death	ib.	Battles between Edmund and
Edward the Martyr :—		Canute	ib.
Succession of Edward	141	Pacification	155
His murder	ib.	Death of Edmund	ib.

CHAPTER VI.

DANES.

Danish Sovereigns—Canute—Harold—Hardecnut—Saxon Line restored—Edward the Confessor—Harold—Victory of William the Conqueror.

Canute :—		Pleases the English	158
Canute succeeds	156	Publishes laws	159
Sends away the children of Ed-		Visits Denmark	160
mund	ib.	His pilgrimage to Rome	ib.
Murders Edwy	157	His letter	ib.
Marries Emma	ib.	Conquers Norway	161
Punishes Edric	ib.	And subdues the Scots	162
Rewards the Danes	ib.	He rebukes his flatterers ..	ib.
Establishes guards	158	His death	ib.

Harold, surnamed Harefoot :—	Restoration of the Godwins ..	173
Succession of Harold	Promotion of Stigand	174
Invasion by Edward	Death of Godwin	ib.
Another by Alfred	Edward's humanity	175
Flight of Emma	War with Macbeth	ib.
Death of Harold	Civil war	176
Hardecanute :—	Conquest of Wales	177
Succession of Hardecanute	Edward sends for his nephew
His revenge	from Germany	178
His magnificence	Harold in Normandy	179
His death	Insurrection of the Northumbrians	180
Edward the Confessor :—	Death of Edward	181
Succession of Edward	Harold :—
His character	Succession of Harold	183
Punishes his mother	William claims the crown	ib.
Is opposed by the king of Nor-	Invasion by the king of Norway	184
way	Who falls in battle	185
Marries Editha	William prepares to invade Eng-
History of Sweyn	land	ib.
Rebellion of the Godwins	Lands in England	ib.
Their banishment	Conduct of Harold	187
Visit from William of Normandy	Battle of Hastings	188
173	Death of Harold	189

CHAPTER VII.

Polity of the Anglo-Saxons—Feudal Customs—Ranks in Society—Courts of Law—Crimes—Slaves.

Manners of Anglo-Saxons	King's court	203
Feudal customs	Witena-gemot	ib.
Lord and vassal	Its members	204
Homage	Its authority	ib.
Division of lands	Judicial proceedings	ib.
Military service	In civil actions	205
Heriots	In criminal prosecutions	206
Marriage licences	Purgation by oath	ib.
Ranks :—	Purgation by ordeal	207
The eorl	Obstacles to the administration of
King	justice	ib.
Queen	Crimes of the Anglo-Saxons	208
Ealdorman	Homicide punished by fine	ib.
Gesith	Weres	209
Thane	Mode of payment	ib.
Gerefa	Theft and robbery	ib.
The ceorl	Their punishment	210
Administration of justice	Number of slaves	ib.
Hundred-motes	Their different classes	ib.
Shire-motes	Manumission	211
Origin of shires	Trade in slaves	212
Of hundreds	Burghers	ib.
Tythings

CHAPTER VIII.

WILLIAM I, SURNAMED THE CONQUEROR.

William is Crowned—Returns to Normandy—Insurrections—Total Subjugation of the Kingdom—Depression of the Natives—Knights' Fees—Incidents of Military Tenures—Innovations in Judicial Proceedings—Domesday—King's Revenue—Insurrection of Norman Barons—Rebellion of Robert, the King's Son—War with France—William's Death—And Character.

Settlement of the Normans in Gaul	217	Gets possession of Ely	236
Birth of William	218	Subdues Scotland	ib.
William marches to Dover	ib.	Edgar submits	237
And to London	219	Consequences of the Norman conquests	238
Edgar appointed king	ib.	Depression of the natives	ib.
But submits to William	220	William's riches	239
Tumult at the king's coronation ..	ib.	Elevation of the foreigners	ib.
Its cause	ib.	Their retainers	240
His kind behaviour to the English ..	221	Establishment of knights' fees ..	ib.
And rewards to his officers	222	Fealty and homage	241
The king returns to Normandy ..	223	Attendance at the king's court ..	ib.
The regents, Odo and Fitz-Osbern	224	Escheats	243
Insurrections	ib.	Reliefs—Aids	244
Murder of Earl Copsi	225	Descents	245
Edric ravages Hereford	ib.	Wardships	ib.
Eustace attacks Dover	ib.	Marriages	ib.
The king returns	ib.	Changes in judicial proceedings ..	246
Reduces Exeter	ib.	Use of the Norman language	ib.
Edwin rebels—Submits	226	Excessive mulcts	ib.
Githa escapes	227	Penalty for murder	247
Edgar in Scotland	ib.	Wager of battle	ib.
Massacre at Durham	228	Separation of the secular and spiritual courts	ib.
Siege of York	ib.	Much of the Anglo-Saxon polity preserved	248
Arrival of the Danes	ib.	Compilation of Domesday	249
York taken	ib.	The king's revenue	ib.
William in the North	229	Rebellion of Norman barons	250
Defeat of the insurgents	ib.	Their fate	ib.
Lays waste Yorkshire and Durham	230	Execution of Waltheof	251
Submission of insurgents	ib.	The murder of Walcher	252
Ravages of Malcolm	231	Imprisonment of Odo	ib.
All places of trust given to Normans	232	Projected invasion of Canute	ib.
English prelates deposed	ib.	War between William and his son Robert	253
Norman prelates: Lanfranc	233	William invades France	ib.
Guitmond	ib.	His last illness	254
Ingulf	234	His death—His burial	255
Death of Edwin	ib.	His character	ib.
Opposition of Hereward	235	His conduct with respect to ecclesiastical concerns	257
He plunders Peterborough	ib.	Famine and pestilence during his reign	258
Makes Turold prisoner	ib.
William besieges Hereward	ib.

CHAPTER IX.

WILLIAM II.

William succeeds—His War with his Brother Robert—He obtains Normandy while Robert goes to the Holy Land—Invades Scotland—And Wales—His Rapacity—He persecutes Archbishop Anselm—Is killed in the New Forest—His Character.

Robert succeeds to Normandy	259	Succession to the crown of Scot-
William hastens to England	.. ib.	land	 267
He is crowned	 260	Incursions of the Welsh	.. ib.
Henry lives in privacy	 ib.	Rebellion of Robert Mowbray	268
Fate of the captives	 ib.	The king's rapacity	 269
Conspiracy against William	 ib.	Character of Ralf Flambard	.. ib.
Banishment of Odo	 261	Conspiracy against him	 ib.
Insurgents reduced	 ib.	The king keeps the bishoprics
State of Normandy	 262	vacant	 270
William invades the duchy	 ib.	Names Anselm to Canterbury	.. 271
Attempt to take Rouen	 ib.	Persecutes Anselm	 272
Peace between the two brothers	 ib.	Dispute about the succession to Expulsion of Henry	 263	the papacy	 ib.
War renewed in Normandy	 ib.	The king is reconciled with An-
Robert mortgages his dominions	265	selm	 274
William opposed in Maine	 ib.	The archbishop goes to Rome	 ib.
Hastens to that province	 ib.	The king's death in the New Fo-
War with Scotland	 266	rest	 ib.
Submission of Malcolm	 ib.	His character	 275
The war renewed	 ib.	His buildings	 ib.

HISTORY

OF ENGLAND.

PRELIMINARY NOTICE BY THE AUTHOR.

SINCE the year 1819, in which the first portion of this work was sent to the press, many new sources of information have been opened to the writer of English history. From time to time ancient documents of high interest and indisputable authority have been rescued from oblivion by searches made under the auspices of the Record Commission, or through the zeal and enterprise of literary societies, and of private individuals. It has been my endeavour to embody the substance of all such discoveries in this present library edition, not indeed by the introduction of notes or dissertations at corresponding epochs, but by interweaving the new matter with the old in one continuous narrative throughout the work. At the same time I have availed myself of the opportunity to fix the dates of events with greater precision, to correct former errors of the pen and of the press, and to alter certain paragraphs, occasionally whole chapters, of the last edition, by recasting or expanding them in conformity with the improvements which I wished to introduce.

The new information of which I speak is spread over every period of our history, from the mention of the Tin-islands by Herodotus, to the flight of James II. in the seventeenth century. In the Corpus Historicum, the late Mr. Petrie, with the aid of his fellow-labourers, has collected every notice that could be found of Britain in the Greek and Roman authors; and after them, in native and contemporary writers of any uation whatsoever, together with all such memorials as tended to throw light on the history of these islands previously to the Norman conquest; a work of infinite labour and of commen-surate utility. Still it left room for additional research: much information was yet to be extracted from the remains of Anglo-Saxon literature: and a considerable portion of that information has been laid before the public by two eminent antiquaries and philologists, Benjamin Thorpe, Esq., in his "Ancient Laws and Institutes of England," and his text and translation of "The Homilies of Ælfric;" and John M. Kemble, Esq., in his very valuable "Codex Diplomaticus Ævi Saxonici."¹ These works open to us a pretty clear insight into the state of society and of literature, and the civil and religious polity which prevailed during the Anglo-Saxon period; a period the more interesting to Englishmen, because it was the cradle of many customs and institutions, which exist among us even at the present day.

The first voluminous collection of documents after the Conquest has been provided for us by the industry of the Rev. Dr. Giles, and regards the controversy between Henry II. and St. Thomas of Canterbury. It filled originally eight volumes in his Patres Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ, and has been extended by subsequent publications to almost as many more. In these volumes may be found whatever was said and written in favour of the archbishop or against him, by friends or foes, natives or foreigners, either before or soon after his death. They contain also narratives of his manner of life during his favour with the king, and subsequently to the great council at Clarendon; and the history of his exile, return, and martyrdom, related by eye-witnesses, his constant companions; besides a most numerous collection of letters on the same subjects from the most celebrated characters in the western church at that period.

The next collection, next in point of time, but still more voluminous and more useful, is that of the Close and Patent Rolls still extant in the Tower, appertaining to the reigns of John and of his son and successor, Henry III. They have been most carefully edited by Thomas Duffus Hardy, Esq., under the direction of the Record Commission, and contain some thousands of entries, which reveal to us historic facts previously unknown, expose the intrigues and correspondence of John during his quarrel with Pope Innocent, and make us acquainted with the whole framework of the government, as the government was then exercised under the despotic sway of our more early monarchs.

¹ I do not mention his "Saxons in England," because the first volume of this edition had been printed before that work was published.

This publication of national documents is followed by another under the direction of the Record Commission, and edited by Sir Francis Palgrave, with the title of "Parliamentary Writs." It commences about the close of the reign of Edward I., and exhibits to us copies of the original writs of summons to individuals, calling on them to attend the great councils or parliaments of the nation; writs for the election of members of the House of Commons, and returns of the persons so elected; writs to individuals, summoning them to the performance of military service, commissions of array, and a variety of matters connected with military levies. These instruments are accompanied with appendices of other records calculated to throw light upon the former, to which has been added a full chronological abstract, to aid the inquirer in the investigation of any particular fact or summons. The immense value of this collection will strike us at once, if we reflect that it shows how, step by step, the despotic form of government, introduced with the Norman kings, was gradually moulded into that more regular shape which it afterwards assumed, and that we often learn from it the real causes and consequences of transactions, which before its appearance were not clearly understood.

Several minor but not unimportant collections bring us down to the reign of Henry VIII., whose character and policy have been greatly elucidated by the publication, not long ago, of a multitude of papers and instruments preserved in the State Paper Office, and appertaining to that period. The first volume was published in 1830, and purported to contain the correspondence of Henry with his ministers of state, his ambassadors, envoys and agents, public and secret; with his commanders, military and naval; with his bishops and with his council, when he happened to be at a distance from it. They offer to us most interesting information respecting the pride, ambition, and character of Cardinal Wolsey, and his power and downfall; respecting the proceedings of Archbishop Cranmer, in his court at Dunstable, and his subsequent servility to the caprice of his imperious master; respecting the treatment and fate of the unfortunate Queen Catherine Howard and her relatives; respecting the persecution by the king of Catholics and reformers, together with several other domestic matters, down to the close of his reign. In the following years four more volumes were added, regarding the government of Ireland and the king's correspondence with his commanders and agents on the northern borders, on occasion of his hostilities with Scotland, and intrigues with the discontented in that kingdom. The reader will see at once the value of these volumes to the historian.

From Henry we pass to his daughter Elizabeth, whose long reign has been most prolific in voluminous collections, some as old as the last century, and others of much later date; as Sir Cuthbert Sharpe's Memorials of the Rebellion of 1569, the copious "Recueil des Lettres de Marie Stuart," by Prince A. Labanoff, the "Bowes Correspondence," the "Leicester Correspondence," and the "Dépêches" of De la Mothe Fénelon, the French ambassador, who came to England about the close of the year 1568; a publication which we owe to the zeal and exertions of Charles Purton Cooper, Esq., secretary to the Record Commission. During the seven years of his residence in England, De la Mothe Fénelon was commissioned by his court to make to the queen a proposal of marriage from the duke of Anjou, and afterwards from the duke of Alençon; to mitigate to the best of his power Elizabeth's hatred of the queen of Scots, and her displeasure against the duke of Norfolk; to appease her indignation at the massacre in Paris on the feast of St. Bartholomew, and to dissuade her from joining with the king of Spain in hostility to France. In the prosecution of these duties he made the most tempting offers to the queen's ministers and their dependents, and spent large sums of money in securing the services of the principal courtiers, and of certain ladies supposed to possess paramount influence over the mind of their sovereign. He had also the advantage of numerous private communications with the queen, both on questions of state, and others of great delicacy respecting herself; and the minuteness with which he describes her deportment and language on all these occasions, even on occasions of amusement and at royal banquets, imparts a freshness and charm of surpassing interest to his narrative. They exhibit to us the daughter of Henry VIII. in the several phases of her character without disguise, in all her pride, and with all her foibles; though I must not conceal my suspicion that in his secret despatches to Catherine, the queen-mother, he may occasionally indulge in fanciful embellishments on matters connected with the private life of the English queen.

The next large collection of documents comprises the "Letters and Speeches of Oliver Cromwell," which have been collected and published with great care and accuracy by Thomas Carlyle, Esq. In these the character of the principal personage is not drawn, as was that of Queen Elizabeth, by the pencil of another, but by the man himself; and in them we may discover all the idiosyncracies that marked his conduct from the time of his derangement at Huntingdon to his death at Whitehall. On that account these documents are well worth the serious attention of the historical student; I mean the letters and speeches themselves, not the running commentary with which the editor has accompanied them, in language most glowing and oracular. In every edition of this work I have allotted to Cromwell that share of praise which I thought, and still think, his due,—a much larger share than he has received from many other writers; but I feel no disposition to fall down before the idol, and worship him at the command of his panegyrist.

During the reigns of Charles II. and James II., the documents the most interesting to Englishmen are the despatches from the French ambassadors and agents, detailing their own proceedings, and the most important events in England and Holland. They have never yet been published. Dalrymple, long ago, inserted copies of some, and extracts from others, in his “Memoirs of Great Britain and Ireland;” and Mr. Fox, when he visited Paris in 1802, was careful to have many transcribed for his own use; of which some, but a few only, have been published. On this account Mazure, when he was preparing materials for his “Histoire de la Révolution de 1688, en Angleterre,” sought out every despatch appertaining to the subject, from whatever quarter it might come; and, as he possessed unrestricted access to the archives of the Ministère des Affaires étrangères de France, transcribed, for the sake of accuracy, every separate piece with his own hand. He did not publish them, but was content to incorporate them in his own work.

It will undoubtedly be noticed that, with respect to the same subjects, I repeatedly quote passages from documents hitherto inedited: and it may with reason be asked, from what source I procured them. I answer, from the very transcripts which were made by Mazure himself. After his death his papers came into my possession; and from them I was enabled sometimes to extract passages which he had passed over, because to him, a foreigner, they did not appear of so much importance as they must appear to a native; and sometimes to correct unintentional mistakes in Mazure's own history, when he occasionally suffered his prepossessions to give to passages an interpretation which the words themselves in those particular circumstances could not bear.

In addition to the voluminous compilations already mentioned, we owe numbers of important papers, and collections of papers, to eminent scholars who have deserved well of their country in this department of literature; to Sir Henry Ellis, Sir Frederic Madden, the late Sir Harris Nicolas, Sir Thomas Phillips, Bart., the Rev. Jos. Stevenson, John Gough Nichols, Esq., John Bruce, Esq., and many others, too many, indeed, to be enumerated here; but their names will be recorded, and their services acknowledged in the following volumes. There remains, however, one name, which shall not be passed over in silence,—that of a female writer, Miss Agnes Strickland, whose claim to the distinction is of a different kind, and peculiarly her own,—the discovery of a new mine of historic lore previously unexplored; a mine which she has also worked with great success in those attractive volumes, her “Lives of the Queens of England.”

In disposing of the new matter derived from these several sources, I have strictly adhered to the same rules to which I subjected myself in the former editions; to admit no statement merely upon trust, to weigh with care the value of the authorities on which I rely, and to watch with jealousy the secret workings of my own personal feelings and prepossessions. Such vigilance is a matter of necessity to every writer of history, if he aspire to the praise of truthfulness and impartiality. He must withdraw himself aloof from the scenes which he describes, and view with the coolness of an unconcerned spectator the events which pass before his eyes, holding with a steady hand the balance between contending parties, and allotting to the more prominent characters that measure of praise or dispraise which he conscientiously believes to be their due. Otherwise, he will be continually tempted to make an unfair use of the privilege of the historian; he will sacrifice the interests of truth to the interests of party, national, or religious, or political. His narrative may still be brilliant, attractive, picturesque; but the pictures which he paints will derive their colouring from the jaundiced eye of the artist himself, and will therefore bear no very faithful resemblance to the realities of life and fact.

Some of my readers may here, perhaps, recollect with what confidence the offence which I have just mentioned, that of sacrificing to party the interests of truth, was laid to my charge on the first appearance of this work; nor is it without feelings of honest pride, that I now call to mind those statements of mine which were then received by popular writers of the day with bursts of indignation, and contradicted by them with sneers of contempt. I allude to the irreverent manner in which I had spoken of the Scottish hero, Sir William Wallace, to the unfair character—so it was deemed—which I had drawn of Archbishop Cranmer, and to the cause to which I had attributed the massacre at Paris on the feast of St. Bartholomew.

More than twenty years have now elapsed, and what has been the result? 1. Every contemporary scrap of paper that could be discovered having any connection with the name of Wallace, has been sought out and laid before the public; but not a single document has yet appeared to show that the hero ever performed any great service to his country during the seven years that passed between his loss of the great battle of Falkirk, and his death on a scaffold in England by the command of Edward III. That death still appears to me to have been the apotheosis to which he was indebted for the worship afterwards paid to his memory in Scotland. 2. The conduct and character of the archbishop have been elucidated by his admirers from his register, from his correspondence at home and abroad, and from his printed works; still nothing has yet been drawn from these sources to prove that I had formed an erroneous estimate, either of his sincerity or of his courage. 3. The publication of the secret despatches from Salviati, the papal nuncio at Paris, has proved, beyond the possibility of doubt, that the massacre was not the result of a premeditated plan, but rose, as I had maintained, out of an accident unforeseen and unexpected.

The result of these controversies may prove a useful lesson to those who are always ready to charge a writer with prejudice, if he dare to call in question notions which they have long cherished; the shibboleth, perhaps, of party, or remaining impressions of early education. Few persons are indeed aware how many statements may be found in most modern histories, which, though generally credited, have no foundation in fact, but are admitted at once, because they have long been repeated by writer after writer without scruple or refutation. Such misstatements abound in the annals of almost every reign, and seem to have frequently originated in the conjecture or indolence of some popular historian.

For instance, we are generally told that Henry VIII. made his last will and testament on December 30th of the year before his death, that he executed it with his own hand, and that he observed in it all the provisions of the statutes passed in his reign. Of fraud or illegality no suspicion is ever hinted: but let the reader turn to the close of the third chapter in the fifth volume of this work, and watch the intrigues and manœuvres of the Camarilla which besieged the bed of the sick monarch, and monopolized his confidence. There he will see how the king was induced to remodel his will, and bequeath to the earl of Hertford, and that nobleman's party, the whole government of the realm during the minority of Prince Edward, his legiti-mate successor; how, towards the end of January, instead of subscribing this instrument with his own hand, he ordered it to be stamped, thus rendering it a nullity by the statutes of the twenty-eighth and thirty-first of his reign: how, by a fraudulent manoeuvre, several gentlemen of the court were led to attest that the will had been signed by the king himself, in their presence, on the 30th of December: how his death was concealed, by the same faction, from the knowledge of the nation and parliament during three days: and how, when his demise was announced to the two houses by the chancellor, these skilful plotters were careful to make known the testamentary provisions in their favour, but most ingeniously contrived to preserve the instrument itself from inspection, that the absence of the royal signature might not be detected. It was a case, perhaps, without parallel in the history of nations. Yet every step in this long course of fraud and imposture is made evident by authentic documents, to which it is impossible to refuse credit.

It is long since I disclaimed any pretensions to that which has been called the philosophy of history, but might with more propriety be termed the philosophy of romance. Novelists, speculatists, and philosophists, always assume the privilege of being acquainted with the secret motives of those whose conduct and characters they describe: but writers of history know nothing more respecting motives than the little which their authorities have disclosed, or the facts necessarily suggest. If they indulge in fanciful conjectures, if they profess to detect the hidden springs of every action, the origin and consequences of every event, they may display acuteness of investigation, profound knowledge of the human heart, and great ingenuity of invention; but no reliance can be placed on the fidelity of their statements. In their eagerness they are apt to measure fact and theory by the same visionary standard; they dispute or overlook every adverse or troublesome authority, and then borrow from imagination whatever may be wanting for the support or embellishment of their new doctrine. They come before us as philosophers who undertake to teach from the records of history: they are in reality literary empirics, who disfigure history to make it accord with their philosophy. Nor do I hesitate to proclaim my belief that no writers have proved more successful in the perversion of historic truth than speculative and philosophical historians.

From these imaginative theories I pass to another topic. Some readers have been known to complain that in the course of my narrative I have so very sparingly introduced those many curious and miscellaneous subjects, which, however foreign to the general purpose of history, are usually welcome to readers of fanciful or limited tastes and pursuits. The objection reminds me of the following very pertinent passage from Tacitus, the Roman historian:—Nerone secundum L. Pisone consulibus, pauca memoriâ digna evenere, nisi cui libeat laudandis fundamentis et trabibus, quâs molem amphitheatri apud campum Martis Cæsar extruxerat, volumina implere; cùm ex dignitate populi Romani repertum sit res inlustres annalibus, talia diurnis urbis actibus mandare.—Tac. Annal. xiii. 31. In the composition of these volumes I have repeatedly had occasion, like Tacitus, to lament the dearth of important incidents, and have been tempted, as he was, to look out for supplementary matter from some foreign source. But the same judicious rule which he had laid down for his guidance, has in all such cases suggested itself to me. One thing for the annals of a great people, another for the journals of the city council; one for the history of England, another for the chronicles of an abbey, or the fortunes of a family, or the subject-matter of any of the several departments into which literature at present is divided. The historian, the genealogist, the topographer, the biographer, the antiquary, the architect, the ecclesiologist, the lecturer (not to mention numberless other candidates for literary fame), have all their peculiar spheres of action: but if the historian encroach on their domain, if he take upon himself their respective duties, he will probably desert the stately and dignified march of the historic muse, to bewilder himself in a labyrinth of dry details and tedious computations; or perhaps substitute, in the place of pure history, an incoherent medley of fragmentary and elementary essays, calculated rather to perplex, than to enlighten, the minds of his readers.

It had been my intention to accompany this prefatory announcement with remarks on several important passages in English history. For our annals, spread over so many centuries, are fraught with animating scenes of national glory, with bright examples of piety, honour, and resolution, and with the most impressive and instructive lessons to princes, statesmen, and people. But a long and painful malady, joined with the infirmities of age, has rendered me incapable of executing the task which I had marked out, and has admonished me to bid a final adieu to those studies with which I have been so long familiar.

The other editions of this work have been received with a kindness for which I ought to feel grateful, and have been honoured with testimonies of approbation, of which I have reason to be proud. The present edition, the last which I can expect to see, will, on account of more recent discoveries and improvements, contain much new and important matter. I here commit it, with all its imperfections, whatever they may be, without anxiety, to the kind indulgence of my readers, under the impression that it will not be found less worthy of their favour and approbation, than any of its predecessors. With this flattering hope and anticipation before me, I now take my leave of the public, and—to borrow the words of the retiring veteran in Virgil—

“Hic cæstus artemque repono.”

HORNEY, December 20, 1849.

The Publisher gladly avails himself of the opportunity afforded by the present reprint, to repair an omission which occurred in the former edition of this Preliminary Notice. Among the names set down by Dr. Lingard, of scholars who, of late years, had deserved well of English history, by the publication of unknown and valuable documents, was that of the Rev. M. A. Tierney, the editor of Dodd, and the annotator on that writer's history. By some accident, that name was omitted: and the Publisher, therefore, is only discharging a duty, in seeing it now restored. There is a letter from Dr. Lingard, addressed to the Rev. E. Price, and written expressly for the purpose of saying that the name in question was intended to be inserted. Mr. Price corrected the press for the former edition.

HISTORY

OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER I.

ROMAN BRITAIN.—A.C. 55.

CÆSAR TWICE INVADES BRITAIN—THE BRITISH TRIBES—THEIR MANNERS—RELIGION—GOVERNMENT—GRADUAL CONQUEST OF BRITAIN BY THE ROMANS—ITS STATE UNDER THE EMPERORS—CONVERSION OF THE NATIVES TO CHRISTIANITY—THE ROMANS ABANDON THE ISLAND.

IT is to the pen of a Roman general that we are indebted for our first acquaintance with the history of Britain. Julius Cæsar, in the short space of three years, had conducted his victorious legions from the foot of the Alps to the mouth of the Rhine. From the coast of the Morini he could descry the white cliffs of the neighbouring island: and the conqueror of Gaul aspired to the glory of adding Britain to the dominions of Rome. The inability or refusal of the Gallic mariners to acquaint him with the number of the inhabitants, their manner of warfare, and their political institutions; and the prudence or timidity of Volusenus, who had been sent to procure information, but returned without venturing to communicate with the natives, served only to irritate his curiosity and to inflame his ambition. The Britons, by lending aid to his enemies, the Veneti, supplied him with a decent pretext for hostilities; and on the 26th of August, in the fifty-fifth year before the Christian era, Cæsar sailed from Calais, with the infantry of two legions. To cross the strait was only the work of a few hours: but, when he saw the opposite heights crowned with multitudes of armed men, he altered his course, and steering along the shore, cast anchor before the spot which is now occupied by the town of Deal. The natives carefully followed the motions of the fleet, urging their horses into the waves, and, by their gestures and shouts, bidding defiance to the invaders. The appearance of the naked barbarians, and a superstitious fear of offending the gods of this unknown world, spread a temporary alarm among the Romans: but after a short pause, the standard-bearer of the tenth legion, calling on his comrades to follow him, leaped with his eagle into the sea; detachments instantly poured from the nearest boats; the beach, after a short struggle, was gained; and the untaught valour of the natives yielded to the arms and the discipline of their enemies.

If the Romans were pre-eminent in the art of war, they were greatly deficient in nautical science. On the fourth night after their arrival, the violence of the wind augmented the usual swell of the waves at a spring tide; the ships, that had been hauled on shore, were filled with water; those which rode at anchor were driven out to sea; and a squadron, employed to bring the cavalry from Gaul, was entirely dispersed. The British chieftains, who had come to the camp to solicit peace, observed the consternation excited by these untoward events; and, having retired separately under different pretexts, concealed themselves, with their forces, in the neighbouring woods. Cæsar was not aware of their design, till he heard that the seventh legion, which had been sent out to forage, was surrounded and overwhelmed by a hostile multitude. The timely arrival of the rest of the army rescued the survivors from utter destruction: but the Britons, steady in their plan, despatched messengers to the neighbouring tribes, to represent the small number of the invaders, and inculcate the necessity of intimidating future adventurers by exterminating the present. A general assault was soon made on the Roman camp; and, although it proved unsuccessful, it taught Cæsar to reflect on the evident danger of his situation, if the inclemency of the weather should interrupt his communication with Gaul, and confine him, during the winter, to a foreign shore, without supplies of provisions. To save his reputation, he gladly accepted an illusory promise of submission from a few of the natives, and hastened back with his army to Gaul, after a short absence of three weeks. It is manifest that he had little reason to boast of the success of this expedition; and on that account he affects in his Commentaries to represent it as undertaken for the sole purpose of discovery. But at Rome

it was hailed as the forerunner of the most splendid victories; the mere invasion of Britain was magnified into the conquest of a new world; and a thanksgiving of twenty days was decreed by the senate to the immortal gods.¹

The ensuing winter was spent by each party in the most active preparations. In spring the Roman army, consisting of five legions and two thousand cavalry, sailed from the coast of Gaul in a fleet of more than eight hundred ships. At the sight of this immense armament stretching across the channel, the Britons retired with precipitation to the woods; and the invaders landed without opposition on the very same spot which they had occupied the preceding year. Cæsar immediately marched in pursuit of the natives, but was recalled the next day by news of the disaster which had befallen his fleet. A storm had risen in the night, in which forty vessels were totally lost, and many others driven on shore. To guard against similar accidents, he ordered the remainder to be dragged above the reach of the tide, and to be surrounded with a fortification of earth. In this laborious task ten days were employed, after which the invaders resumed their march towards the interior of the country. Each day was marked by some partial rencounter, in which the natives appear to have frequently obtained the advantage. It was their policy to shun a general engagement. Divided into small bodies, but stationed within hail of each other, they watched the march of the enemy, cut off the stragglers, and diligently improved every opportunity of annoyance. Their principal warriors, who fought from chariots, extorted by their skill

¹ Cæs. de Bel. Gal. iv. 20—36. Dio, xxxix. 120. Cæsar, in his letters, described the island as of immense extent—another world: alium orbem terrarum.—Eumen.

Paneg. p. 174. Of his success, Lucan says plainly:—

Territa quæsitis ostendit terga Britannis.
Luc. ii. 572.

and intrepidity the applause of the Romans. On the most rapid descent, or the very brink of a precipice, they guided their vehicles with as much safety as on the level plain. No danger appalled them. They drove fearlessly along the Roman line, espied every opportunity of breaking the ranks of the enemy, and during the heat of the action would run along the pole, leap on the ground, or regain their seats, as the events of the moment seemed to demand. If they despaired of success, they retired with rapidity; if they were pursued, they abandoned their chariots, and with their pikes resisted on foot the charge of the cavalry. It required all the art of Cæsar to inflict any serious injury on so active a foe. At length three of the legions with all the cavalry were sent out to forage, and their apparent disorder invited the Britons to attack them with their whole force. Descending from the hills, they poured through every opening, and penetrated as far as the eagles: but the veterans received them with coolness; the cavalry pursued them in their flight, and few were able to regain the mountains and woods. Dispirited by this check, many of the confederate tribes retired to their homes; and Cassibelan, king of the Cassii, the chief of the allies, was left to support the whole pressure of the war.

By repeated victories over his neighbours, Cassibelan had acquired high renown among the natives. The tribes on the right bank of the Thames had invited him to place himself at their head; and his conduct during the war seems to have justified the selection. Deserted by his confederates, he retreated into his own territories, that he might place the Thames between himself and his pursuers. At the only ford he ordered sharp stakes to be fixed in the bed of the river; lined the left bank with palisades; and stationed behind these the principal part of his army. But the advance of the Romans was not to be retarded by artificial difficulties. The cavalry, without hesitation, plunged into the river; the infantry followed, though the water reached to their shoulders; and the Britons, intimidated by the intrepid aspect of the invaders, fled to the woods. Such is the account of this transaction which has been given by Cæsar: but Polyænus attributes his success to the panic caused by the sight of an elephant. At the approach of this unknown animal of enormous magnitude, covered with scales of polished steel, and carrying on his back a turret filled with armed men, the Britons abandoned their defences, and sought for safety by a precipitate flight.¹

The king of the Cassii was not, however, discouraged. To impede the progress of the enemy, he laid waste his own territories. By his orders the habitations were burnt, the cattle driven away, and the provisions destroyed, and, as the Romans marched through this desert, Cassibelan himself, with four thousand chariots, carefully watched all their motions. But the unfortunate chieftain had to contend, not only with the foreign enemy, but also with the jealousy and resentment of his own countrymen. He had formerly subdued the Trinobantes, a contiguous nation. In the contest, their king Immanuentius had been slain; and his son Mandubratius was now an exile, serving in the army of the invaders. The Trinobantes offered to submit to the Romans, on condition that they should be governed by the son of Immanuentius; and several tribes, which bore with impatience the yoke of the Cassii, following their example, solicited the protection of Cæsar. By these he was conducted to the capital or principal fortress of Cassibelan, situated on the spot where afterwards Verulam was built, and near to the present town of St. Alban's. It was surrounded with a rampart and ditch, and covered on every side by extensive marshes and forests. Even Cæsar admired the judgment with which the position had been selected, and the art with which it was fortified. Its defences, however, were easily forced by the Romans; and the cattle of Cassibelan, his principal treasure, became the prey of the conquerors.

¹ Polyæn. viii. 737. Lug. Bat. 1691.

The British king still waited the issue of his plans in another quarter. He had instructed the four chieftains of Kent to assemble their forces, assault the Roman camp, and set fire to the ships. If this attempt had succeeded, the Romans would have been involved in inextricable difficulties. But the men of Kent were defeated; and Cassibelan condescended to sue for peace. Cæsar, who feared the approach of the equinox, willingly prescribed the following conditions: that he should give hostages, should live in amity with the Trinobantes, and should furnish his share to the annual tribute which was to be imposed on Britain. The Romans immediately marched back to the coast; the fleet had already been refitted, and Cæsar returned to Gaul in the month of September.¹

Such were the petty results of this mighty expedition. The citizens of Rome celebrated with joy the victories of their favourite general: but the conqueror of Britain was not master of one foot of British ground. The inhabitants, however, and the productions of "the new world," became objects of interest to the more civilized nations of Greece and Italy; and the industry of writers was eagerly employed to satisfy the curiosity of the public. Of their works, many have undoubtedly perished; from those which remain has been gleaned the following account of ancient Britain, such as it is described to have been about the commencement of the Christian era.

The principal nations of Europe are shown, from the radical difference in their languages, to be descended from the three great families of the Celtæ, Gothi, and Sarmatæ: and from the countries which they have successively occupied, it appears that the Celtæ were the first who crossed the limits of Asia into Europe; that, as the tide of population continued to roll towards the west, they were pushed forward by the advance of the Gothic nations; and that these in their turn yielded to the pressure of the tribes of the Sarmatæ. At the dawn of history we find the Celtæ dispersed over a great part of Europe: in the time of Cæsar they occupied the principal portion of Spain, of Gaul, and of the British isles.² That conqueror, in describing the inhabitants of Britain, could speak from personal knowledge of none but the tribes that dwelt near the mouth of the Thames. These, he informs us, were of Belgic descent. Their ancestors had, at no very distant period, invaded the island, expelled the original inhabitants from the coast, and in their new settlements still retained

¹ Cæs. v. 1-23. Dio, xl. 146. On the calends of September Cæsar had sent to Cicero an account of the campaign in a private letter. From the language of Cicero, that it "was favourable or satisfactory enough,"—litteras satis commodas de Britannicis rebus (ad Quint. Frat. l. iii. ep. 1), we may infer, that he did not deem it very glorious to the arms of Rome. Had the expedition proved successful, we should probably have had a poem on the conquest of Britain from the pen of Cicero; for so he had promised to his brother Quintus, who accompanied Cæsar. Modo mihi date Britanniam, quam pingam coloribus tuis, penicillo meo.—Lib. ii. ep. 14.

² It is doubtful whether the Belgic tribes should be considered as of Celtic or Gothic origin.

the names of the parent states.¹ Beyond them dwelt other tribes less familiarized with the habits of civilized life. When he inquired after their origin, he was told that their ancestors were the spontaneous production of the soil: later discoveries showed that they were Celtæ, the descendants of the first colonists of Britain.²

The number of the inhabitants in the districts which fell under his observation, astonished the Roman general: and there is reason to believe that many other districts were equally well peopled.³ The population of the whole island comprised above forty tribes, of which several, while they retained their former appellations, had been deprived of their independence, at the same time that others, amid the revolutions of two or three centuries, had risen to a high pre-eminence of power. The long tract of land to the south of the Severn and the Thames was unequally portioned among ten nations, of which the principal were the Cantii, or men of Kent; the Belgæ, or inhabitants of the present counties of Hampshire and Wilts; and the Damnonii, who, from the river Ex, had gradually extended themselves to the western promontory. Across the arm of the sea, now called the Bristol Channel, the most powerful was the tribe of the Silures. From the banks of the Wye, their original seat, they had carried their arms to the Dee and the ocean; and their authority was acknowledged by the Ordovices and the Dimetæ, the inhabitants of the northern mountains, and of the western district of Wales. On the eastern coast of the island, between the Thames and the Stour, lay the Trinobantes, whose capital was London; and from the Stour to the Humber stretched the two kindred nations of the Iceni, called Cenimagni and Coitanni. The Dobuni and Cassii, confederate tribes under the rule of Cassibelan, extended along the left bank of the Thames, from the Severn to the Trinobantes; and above them dwelt the Carnabii and several clans of minor consequence. The Brigantes were the most powerful of all the British nations. They were bounded by the Humber on the south, and by the Tyne on the north; and had subdued the Volantii and Sissantii of the western coast. To the north of the Brigantes were five tribes, known by the general appellation of Mætæ: and beyond these wandered amid the lakes and mountains various clans, among which the Caledonians claimed the praise of superior courage, or superior ferocity.⁴

By the Roman writers all the natives of Britain are indiscriminately denominated barbarians, a term of indefinite import, which must vary its

¹ Cæs. ii. 3; v. 12.

² I shall not notice the fable of Brutus, the great-grandson of Æneas, who gave his name to the island, and whose descendants are said to have swayed the sceptre for many generations (Nennius says he extracted it ex veteribus scriptis veterum nostrorum (edit. Bert. 104); which makes it older than Geoffry or Tyssilio): nor the dreams of more recent antiquaries, who have sought out the patriarch of the Cymri in the ark of Noah, and conducted him and his children through a thousand perils to Britain.—The triads have given us the names, and, in some instances, the origin of the three primeval tribes that settled in Britain; of the three foreign tribes, that were peaceably admitted; and of the three usurping tribes, that obtained possession of the greater part of the island. But whatever may be the antiquity of the triads, their testimony must be doubtful, as being founded either on oral tradition, or on fictions framed originally to solve appearances. For Gildas informs us that in his time there did not exist among his countrymen any historical documents: Quippe quæ, si qua fuerint, aut ignibus hostium deleta, aut civium exilii classe longius deportata, non compareant.—Gild. edit. Bert. p. 69.

³ Hominum est infinita multitudo.—Cæs. v. 12. Πολυάνθρωπος νῆσος.—Diod. Sic. v. 347. Brigantes, civitas numerosissima.—Tac. Agric. c. 17.

⁴ Ptolem. viii. 2. Ricard. Corin. i. 6. Whitaker's Manchester, i. 91; ii. 201.

signification with the subject to which it is applied. Though far removed from the elegance and refinement of their invaders, the Belgic tribes of the south might almost claim the praise of civilization, in comparison with their northern brethren. Their dress was of their own manufacture. A square mantle covered a vest and trowsers, or a deeply plaited tunic of braided cloth; the waist was encircled with a belt; rings adorned the second finger of each hand; and a chain of iron or brass was suspended from the neck.¹ Their huts resembled those of their Gallic neighbours. A foundation of stone supported a circular wall of timber and reeds; over which was thrown a conical roof, pierced in the centre for the twofold purpose of admitting light and discharging the smoke.² In husbandry they possessed considerable skill. They had discovered the use of marl as a manure; they raised more corn than was necessary for their own consumption; and, to preserve it till the following harvest, they generally stored it in the cavities of rocks.³ But beyond the borders of the southern tribes, these faint traces of civilization gradually disappeared. The midland and western nations were unacquainted with either agriculture or manufactures; their riches consisted in the extent of their pastures, and the number of their flocks. With milk and flesh they satisfied the cravings of hunger; and, clothed in skins, they bade defiance to the inclemency of the seasons.⁴ But even sheep were scarcely known in the more northern parts; and the hordes of savages who roamed through the wilds of Caledonia often depended for support on the casual produce of the chase. They went almost naked; and sheltered themselves from the weather under the cover of the woods, or in the caverns of the mountains. Their situation had hardened both their minds and bodies. If it had made them patient of fatigue and privation, it had also taught them to be rapacious, bloody, and revengeful. When Severus invaded their country, the Roman legions were appalled at the strength, the activity, the hardihood, and ferocity of these northern Britons.⁵

The superior civilization of the southern tribes was attributed by historians to their intercourse with the strangers whom the pursuits of commerce attracted to their coast.⁶ When the Spanish ores began to be exhausted, the principal supply of tin was sought from the mines of Britain. The first who exported this metal from the island, and conveyed it to the different ports in the Mediterranean, were certain Phœnician adventurers from Cadiz. To monopolize so valuable a branch of commerce, they carefully concealed the place from the knowledge of their neighbours; and about five centuries before the birth of Christ, Herodotus, the father of profane history, candidly acknowledged that he had been unable to discover the real position of the "Cassiterides, or Tin-islands."⁷ The Phœnicians of Carthage were more successful. Anxious to share in the trade with their brethren of Cadiz, Hanno and Himilco undertook separate voyages of discovery. Having passed the Straits, Hanno turned to the left, and explored the coast of

¹ Plin. viii. 48; xxxiii. 1. Dio Nic. in Nerone, p. 169. Whitaker's Manchester, vii. 5.

² Cæs. v. 12. Diod. Sic. v. p. 347. Strabo, iv. 197.

³ Plin. Hist. Nat. xvii. 6, 8. Diod. Sic. v. p. 347.

⁴ Cæs. v. 14.

⁵ Mela, iii. p. 264. Dio Nic. in Severo, p. 340. Herodian, iii. 47.

⁶ Cæs. v. 14. Diod. Sic. v. 347.

⁷ Strab. iii. 175. Plin. vii. 56. Herod. iii. 203. Lug. Bat. 1715.

Africa: Himilco, shaping his course to the north, crept along the shore of Spain, stretched, by accident or design, across the ocean, and in the fourth month discovered the object of his voyage. The Æstrymnides (so the Tin-islands are called in his journal, which was extant as late as the fifth century) were distant two days' sail from "the sacred isle of the Hibernians," and that isle lay near to the isle of the Albions.¹ The success of the Carthaginians awakened the hopes of the Grecian colonists of Marseilles; and Pytheas, their most celebrated navigator, during his voyage in the northern seas, had also the good fortune to discover the Cassiterides.² They were ten in number, abounding in mines of tin and lead, and divided by a narrow but boisterous strait from the coast of the Damnonii. The largest was called Silura or Sigdelis, a name in which may be discovered the origin of their present appellation, "the Scilly isles." Nine out of the ten were inhabited: and the natives are described as a peaceful and industrious race, much addicted to habits of religious worship and divination. They wore long tunics of a dark colour; were unacquainted with the use of money; had no fixed places of habitation, and crossed from isle to isle in boats of wicker-work covered with leather.³

By these successive discoveries the trade was at last thrown open to different nations. Pulcius Crassus, a Roman officer, who having, in a visit to the Cassiterides, observed that the metal lay at a short depth below the surface, and that the natives were beginning to devote themselves to the practice of navigation, described on his return the real position of the islets to those merchants, who wished to trade directly with the inhabitants, though the voyage thither would be longer than the usual passage from Gaul to Britain. The tin was bought up by factors on the coast of the Mediterranean, and conveyed over land to the remote provinces of India.⁴ But the navigation by the Pillars of Hercules was now abandoned as too expensive and dangerous. The British miners having cast their tin into square blocks, conveyed it to the Isle of Wight, the general deposit. Thence it was exported by Gallic traders to the mouths of the Seine, the Loire, or the Garonne; and ascending these rivers, was carried across the land on the backs of horses, till it could be conveyed by water-carriage to the great commercial cities of Marseilles or Narbonne.⁵ In return for this metal, so highly prized by the ancient nations, the Britons received articles of inferior value to the importers, but of high estimation to an uncivilized people; salt for the preservation of provisions, earthenware for domestic use, and brass for the manufacture of arms and ornaments.⁶

The enterprise and researches of

¹ Fest. Avien. Ora. Marit. v. 117, 410. Ast hinc duobus in sacram (sic insulam Dixere prisci), solibus cursus rati est, Eamque late gens Hibernorum colit.

Ibid. v. 108.

Why Sacram? Diodorus says it was called Irin, the very name by which it is known to the natives at this day: την ὀνομαζομένην ἱριν. Diod. Sic. 365. May not the resemblance between ἱριν and ἱερὰν have given rise to the epithet "sacred?"

² Plin. ii. 75. Voss. de Hist. Græc. iv. The Romans also, after several fruitless attempts, discovered the Cassiterides. A story is told of a Phenician merchant, who seeing himself closely watched by a Roman trader, ran his ship ashore, that he might not disclose the secret to a rival. He was recompensed for his loss out of the public treasury.—Strab. iii. 175.

³ Sol. xxii. 42. Fest. Avien. v. 95. Strab. iii. 175. The encroachments of the sea, by gradually inundating the low lands, have multiplied the number of islets.

⁴ Strab. iii. 175. Plin. xxxiv. 17.

⁵ The whole journey was performed in about thirty days. See Diod. Sic. v. 346, 347, 361. Strab. iii. 147.

⁶ Strab. iii. 175.

the foreigners quickened the industry of the natives. Tin had originally formed the sole article of their commerce; to the exportation of tin was soon added that of hides, which were procured in immense numbers from the tribes in the interior; lead was next extracted from veins open to the day; and then followed a most valuable acquisition, the discovery and use of iron.¹ But report had exaggerated the productions of the country far beyond their real value: and at the time of the invasion, the Romans flattered themselves with the hope of conquering an island, of which the shores abounded with pearls, and the soil with ores of the more precious metals. Their avarice was, however, defeated. Of gold or silver not the smallest trace was discovered;² nor were the British pearls of a size or colour which could reward the labour of the collector.³ Yet the invasion produced one advantage to the natives. They sought and at last discovered ores of the very metals after which Roman avarice had so anxiously but fruitlessly inquired: and the British exports, at the commencement of the Christian era, comprised, if we may credit a contemporary and well-informed writer, corn and cattle, gold and silver, tin, lead and iron, skins, slaves, and dogs.⁴

Of the peculiar customs of the Britons but few and imperfect notices have been transmitted to posterity. One strange and disgusting practice, that of painting the body, seems to have prevailed in many parts of the island. For this purpose the southern tribes employed a blue dye, extracted from woad, which gave to them, in the eyes of foreigners, the appearance of Ethiopians. It was adopted equally by both sexes; and was consecrated in their estimation by religious ceremonies.⁵ Connected with this was the still more barbarous practice of tattooing, so long in use among the more northern Britons. At an early age, the outlines of animals were impressed with pointed instruments in the skin; a strong infusion of woad was rubbed into the punctures; and the figures, expanding with the growth of the body, retained their original appearance through life. The Briton was vain of this hideous ornament: and to exhibit it to the eyes of his enemies, he was always careful to throw off his clothes on the day of battle.⁶

The religion of the natives was that of the druids, whether it had been brought by them from Gaul, as is the more natural supposition, or, as Cæsar asserts, had been invented in the island. The druids adored, under different appellations, the same gods as the Greeks and Romans. Pluto they considered as their progenitor: Apollo, Mars, Jupiter, and Minerva were severally worshipped: but to Mercury, as the inventor of the useful arts, they paid a more particular veneration.⁷ To these, the superior gods, they added, like other polytheists, a multitude of local deities,

¹ Plin. iv. 22; xxxiv. 17. Cæs. v. 12.

² Illud cognitum est, neque auri neque argenti scrupulum esse ullum in illa insula. Cic. ep. ad Fam. vii. 7; ad Att. iv. 10.

³ Parvos atque decolores.—Plin. ix. 35. Orien says that they were cloudy, and less bright than those of India.—Com. in Matth. 211. Yet Cæsar dedicated to Venus a breast-plate ornamented with pearls, which he pretended to have found in Britain.—Plin. ibid.

⁴ Tac. Tit. Agric. xii. Strab. iv. 189.

⁵ Plin. xxii. 1. Mela, iii. 6. Cæsar (v. 14) says: Omnes vero se Britanni vitro inefficient. As, however, he had not seen any of the more remote tribes, it is uncertain whether his observation should be applied to them.

⁶ Solin. xxii. 43. Herod. iii. 47. It was practised by the Picts as late as the fifth century.

Perlegit exangues Picto moriente figuras. Claud. Bel. Get. v. 185.

⁷ Cæs. vi. 15, 16.

the genii of the woods, rivers, and mountains.¹ Some fanciful writers have pretended that they rejected the use of temples through a sublime notion of the Divine immensity: perhaps the absence of such structures may, with more probability, be referred to their want of architectural skill. On the oak they looked with peculiar reverence. This monarch of the forest, from its strength and durability, was considered as the most appropriate emblem of the Divinity.² The tree and its productions were deemed holy: to its trunk was bound the victim destined for slaughter: and of its leaves were formed the chaplets worn at the time of sacrifice. If it chanced to produce the misseltoe, the whole tribe was summoned: two white heifers were immolated under its branches; the principal druid cut the sacred plant with a knife of gold; and a religious feast terminated the ceremonies of the day.³

The druids were accustomed to dwell at a distance from the profane, in huts or caverns, amid the silence and gloom of the forest. There, at the hours of noon or midnight, when the Deity was supposed to honour the sacred spot with his presence, the trembling votary was admitted within a circle of lofty oaks, to prefer his prayer, and listen to the responses of the minister.⁴ In peace they offered the fruits of the earth: in war they devoted to the god of battles the spoils of the enemy. The cattle were slaughtered in his honour; and a pile formed of the rest of the booty was consecrated as a monument of his powerful assistance.⁵ But in the hour of danger or distress, human sacrifices were deemed the most efficacious. Impelled by a superstition, which steelled all the feelings of humanity, the officiating priest plunged his dagger into the breast of his victim, whether captive or malefactor; and from the rapidity with which the blood issued from the wound, and the convulsions in which the sufferer expired, announced the future happiness or calamity of his country.⁶

To the veneration which the British druids derived from their sacerdotal character, must be added the respect which the reputation of knowledge never fails to extort from the ignorant. They professed to be the depositories of a mysterious science, far above the comprehension of the vulgar: and their schools were opened to none but the sons of illustrious families. Such was their fame, that the druids of Gaul, to attain the perfection of the institute, did not disdain to study under their British brethren.⁷ With them, as with similar orders of priests among the ancients, a long course of preparatory discipline was required: and we are told that many had the patience to spend no less than twenty years in this state of probation. The initiated were bound to the most inviolable secrecy; and, that the profane might be kept in ignorance of their doctrines, the use of letters was prohibited, and each precept was delivered in verse by the teacher, and committed to memory by the disciple.⁸

¹ Gild. ii. Many of these local deities are named in inscriptions which still exist.

² "Αγαλμα δὲ Διὸς κελευκὸν ὑψηλὴν ἔρϋς. Max. Tyr. Dissert. xxxviii. p. 67.

³ Plin. xvi. 44.

⁴ Mela, iii. 243. Luc. i. v. 453; iii. v. 399, 423. Tac. Ann. xiv. 20. I have not noticed the circles of unheaven stones, the remains of which still exist at Stonehenge, Abury, &c., because I do not find that such stones are ever mentioned by ancient writers, as appendages to places of worship among the Celts.

⁵ Cæs. iv. 16.

⁶ Diod. Sic. v. 354. Tac. Ann. xiv. 30. Cæs. vi. 15. Plin. xxx. 1. Strab. iv. 198.

⁷ Cæs. vi. 12.

⁸ Cæs. vi. 13. Αἰνιγματωδῶς. Diog. Laert. in proem. p. 5. Amstel. apud West.

Of tenets thus anxiously concealed, it is not to be expected that much should be distinctly known: the following particulars have been collected from the few notices contained in the ancient historians, compared with the doctrines peculiar to the bards. The druids professed to be acquainted with the nature, the power, and the providence of the Divinity; with the figure, size, formation, and final destruction of the earth; with the stars, their position and motions, and their supposed influence over human affairs.¹ They practised the art of divination. Three of their ancient astrologers were able, it is said, to foretell whatever should happen before the day of doom; and their skill in magic was so great, that, according to Pliny, the Persians themselves might be thought to be their disciples.² To medicine also they had pretensions: but their knowledge was principally confined to the use of the missetoe, vervain, savin, and trefoil; and even the efficacy of these simples was attributed not to the nature of the plants, but to the influence of prayers and incantations.³ The great objects of the order were, according to themselves, "to reform morals, to secure peace, and to encourage goodness:" and the following lesson, which they inculcated to the people, was certainly conducive to those ends: "The three first principles of wisdom are, obedience to the laws of God, concern for the good of man, and fortitude under the accidents of life."⁴ They also taught the immortality of the human soul; but to this great truth they added the absurd fiction of metempsychosis.⁵ Man is placed, according to their doctrine, in the circle of courses: good and evil are placed before him for his selection. If he prefer the former, death transmits him from the earth into the circle of felicity: but if he prefer the latter, death returns him into the circle of courses: he is made to do penance for a time in the body of a beast or reptile; and then permitted to reassume the form of man. According to the predominance of vice or virtue in his disposition, a repetition of his probation may be necessary: but, after a certain number of transmigrations, his offences will be expiated, his passions subdued, and the circle of felicity will receive him among its inhabitants.⁶ It was to this doctrine that the Romans attributed that contempt of death which was so conspicuous in the Celtic nations.⁷

¹ Cæs. vi. 13. Mela, iii. 243. Amm. Mar. xv. 427.

² Mela, iii. 243. Plin. xxx. 1. Solin. xxii. 42. Diod. Sic. v. 354. Cic. de Div. i. 41. Triad, 89.

³ Plin. xvi. 44; xxiv. 11; xxv. 9; xxx. 1.

⁴ These two triads may be seen in Davies (Celtic Researches, 171, 182). It is remarkable that the latter had been translated by Diogenes Laertius many centuries ago. Σέβειν θεούς, καὶ μηδὲν κακὸν ὄραν, καὶ ἀνδρείαν ἀσκεῖν. (Diog. Laert. in proem. p. 5.)

⁵ Cæs. vi. 13. Mel. iii. 243. Diod. Sic. v. 352. Strabo, iv. 197. I have added an explanation of the metempsychosis from the writings of the bards. It is so improbable that such a system should have been invented after the introduction of Christianity, that I think it may fairly be considered a relic of the druidical doctrine. For the same reason

I would attribute to these ancient priests the rhyu or mysterious language, so often mentioned by the bards. To every tree and shrub, to their leaves, flowers, and branches, they seem to have affixed a fanciful and symbolical meaning: and these allegorical substitutes for the real names of beings and their properties must have formed, in their numerous combinations, a species of jargon perfectly unintelligible to any but the adepts. This acquirement appears to have been prized for many centuries in proportion to its difficulty and folly. Taliessin boasts with complacency, that he is acquainted with every spring in the cave of the diviner: that he knows the intent of the trees in the memorial of compacts: that he knows both good and evil. See Davies, Celtic Researches, 245—253.

⁶ See the triads in William's Poems, ii. 227, and the epitome of them in Davies, p. 185.

⁷ Cæs. vi. 13. Mela, iii. 243.

It will not excite surprise that men, whose office and pretended attainments raised them so much above the vulgar, should acquire and exercise the most absolute dominion over the minds of their countrymen. In public and private deliberations of any moment, their opinion was always asked, and was generally obeyed. By their authority peace was preserved; in their presence passion and revenge were silenced; and at their mandate contending armies consented to sheath their swords. Civil controversies were submitted to their decision; and the punishment of crimes was reserved to their justice. Religion supplied them with the power of enforcing submission. Disobedience was followed by excommunication: and from that instant the culprit was banished from their sacrifices, cut off from the protection of the laws, and stigmatized as a disgrace to his family and country.¹

As the druids delivered their instructions in verse, they must have had some notion of poetry, and we find among them a particular class distinguished by the title of bards. By the triads their origin is ascribed to certain personages, who, from their names, appear to be enigmatical, rather than real, characters.² The bard was a musician as well as a poet: and he constantly accompanied with his voice the sounds of his harp. Every chieftain retained one or more of them in his service. They attended in his hall; eulogized his bounty and his valour; and sang the praises and the history of their country. At the festive board, in the hour of merriment and intoxication, the bard struck his harp; and every bosom glowed with admiration of the heroes whom he celebrated, and of the sentiments which he aimed to inspire. He accompanied the chief and his clan to the field of battle; to the sound of his harp they marched against the enemy; and in the heat of the contest animated themselves with the hope that their actions would be renowned in song, and transmitted to the admiration of their posterity.³

The form of government adopted by the British tribes has scarcely been noticed in history. In some, the supreme authority appears to have been divided among several chieftains; in most, it had been intrusted to a single individual; but in all, the people continued to possess considerable influence. With respect to the succession, there are instances in which the father had portioned his dominions among his children, and others in which the reigning prince left his crown to his widow, who both exercised the more peaceful duties of royalty, and with arms in her hands conducted her subjects to the field of battle.⁴ But in the absence of any fixed notions of succession, it is probable that power would frequently supply the place of right, and the weaker state fall a victim to the ambition of a more warlike neighbour. We are told that the Britons were quarrelsome, rapacious, and revengeful; that every nation was torn by intestine factions; and that pretexts were never wanting to justify oppres-

Inde ruendi
In ferrum mens prona viris, animæque
capaces Mortis, et ignavum reditura parcere vitæ.—Lucan, i. 460.

¹ Cæs. vi. 12. Diod. Sic. v. 354. Strabo, iv. 187. Dio Chrys. orat. xlix. p. 538.

² Triad, 58.

³ Diod. Sic. v. p. 354. Athenæus, vi.

p. 246. Ammian. Mar. xv. 24. Strabo, iv. 187.

Vos quoque, qui fortes animas, belloque peremptas Laudibus in longum vates dimittitis seuam,
Plurima securi fudistis carmina Bardi.

Lucan, i. 447.

⁴ Cæs. v. 11, 20, 22. Diod. Sic. v. p. 347. Mela, iii. p. 264. Tac. Agric. xvi. Dio Cass. lx. p. 779. Dio, in Sever. p. 339.

sion, when it could be committed with impunity. It was this rancorous hostility among themselves which accelerated their subjugation to the power of Rome. "There is not," says Tacitus, "a more fortunate circumstance, than that these powerful nations make not one common cause. They fight single, and unsupported; and each in its turn is compelled to receive the Roman yoke."¹

Such were the Britons, who by their bravery and perseverance baffled the attempts of the first, and the most warlike, of the Cæsars. From that period to the reign of Claudius, during the lapse of ninety-seven years, they retained their original independence. During the civil wars, the attention of the Romans was too actively employed at home, to think of foreign conquest. Augustus thrice announced his intention of annexing Britain to the empire: but the danger was averted, on one occasion by a submissive embassy from the natives, on the others by the intervention of more important concerns.² Instead of exacting the tribute imposed by Cæsar, he contented himself with levying duties on the trade between Gaul and Britain, a measure which brought a larger sum into the imperial treasury, and was borne without murmuring by the inhabitants.³ Yet this financial experiment has been magnified, by the flattery of a courtier, into the conquest of the whole island.⁴

Tiberius pretended that the empire was already too extensive; and sought to justify his own indolence by the policy of Augustus.⁵ In opposition to his conduct, his nephew and successor Caligula exhibited to the world a farce, worthy of the childish prince by whom it was planned. Cunobeline, the most powerful of the successors of Cassibelan, had banished his son Adminius. The exile repaired to the emperor, and, as if Britain had been his patrimony, made a surrender of the island into the hands of Caligula. The glorious intelligence was immediately transmitted to the senate: and the army, raised for the war against the Germans, was ordered to assemble on the coast of Gesoriacum.⁶ As soon as the emperor arrived, he arrayed the legions on the shore, rowed out to sea in the imperial galley, returned precipitately, and gave the signal of battle. The soldiers, in suspense and astonishment, inquired for the enemy, but Caligula informed them, that they had that day conquered the ocean, and commanded them to collect its spoils, the shells on the beach, as a proof of their victory. To perpetuate the memory of his folly, he laid the foundation of a lofty beacon, and returned to Rome to give himself the honours of a triumph.⁷

But the empty pageantry of Caligula was soon succeeded by the real horrors of invasion. Instigated by Beric, a British chieftain, whom domestic feuds had expelled from his native country, the emperor Claudius commanded Aulus Plautius to transport four legions with their auxiliaries into Britain. It was with difficulty that the troops could be induced to engage in the expedition: but, as they crossed the channel, a meteor was seen moving in the direction of the fleet, and was hailed as a certain omen of victory.

¹ Maxime imperitandi cupidine, et studio prolatandæ quæ possident.—Mela, iii. 285. Tacit. Agric. xii.

² Dio, xlix. p. 472; liii. 598. Hor. l. i. Ode 22, iv. 12.

³ Strabo, iv. p. 200.

⁴ Præsens divus habebitur Augustus, adjectis Britannis Imperio.—Hor. iii. 5.

⁵ Tac. Agric. xiii.

⁶ Boulogne.

⁷ Suet. in Calig. 46, 47. Dio, lix. 754. The ruins of Britenhuis on the coast of Holland have been supposed to be the remains of this beacon.—Camd. p. liv. Gibson's version. But in all probability it would be raised at Boulogne.

Caracac before Julius the Roman General

The Britons, under the command of Caractacus and Togidumnus, the two sons of Cunobeline, adopted the policy of their ancestors, and endeavoured to harass, rather than to repel; the invaders. But the German auxiliaries, better fitted for such warfare than the legionary soldiers, followed them across rivers and morasses: and though the natives made a gallant resistance, drove them, with the loss of Togidumnus, to the northern bank of the Thames. The emperor himself now took the command, penetrated to Camalodunum,¹ and received the submission of the Britons in the vicinity. At his departure, he divided the Roman forces between the legate Plautius, and Vespasian, an officer whose merit afterwards invested him with the purple. To the care of Plautius was assigned the left, to that of Vespasian the right bank of the Thames. Both experienced from the natives the most determined resistance. Vespasian fought no less than thirty battles, before he could subdue the Belgæ and the natives of the Isle of Wight: Plautius, during the five remaining years of his government, was opposed by Caractacus at the head of the Cassii and Silures, who, though frequently beaten, as often renewed the contest. Claudius had entered Rome in triumph: to Plautius, for his services, was decreed the inferior honour of an ovation.²

Ostorius Scapula was the successor of Plautius. To repress the inroads of the unsubdued Britons, he erected two chains of forts, one in the north, along the river Avon, the other in the west, along the left bank of the Severn. The reduced tribes were gradually moulded into the form of a Roman province: and, when the Iceni dared to refuse the yoke, their rebellion was severely punished, and a colony of veterans was planted at Camalodunum to insure their obedience. The freedom of Britain now sought an asylum among the Silures. The enthusiastic attachment of that people to their independence had caused them to be compared to the ancient Sicambri; and their hatred of the Roman name had been envenomed by an incautious expression of Ostorius, that their existence as a people was incompatible with his projects. In Shropshire, at the confluence of the Coln and Teme, stands a lofty hill called Caer-Caradoc, still retaining the vestiges of ancient fortifications. There Caractacus and the Silures determined to defend the liberty of their country. The bank of the river was lined with troops, and the ascent of the hill was fortified with ramparts of loose stones. At the approach of the Romans, the Britons bound themselves by an oath to conquer or die, and defied with loud exclamations the attack of the enemy. Ostorius himself hesitated; but at the demand of the legions the signal of battle was given, the passage of the river was forced, and the Romans, under showers of darts, mounted the hill, burst over the ramparts, and drove the Silures from the summit. The wife and daughter of Caractacus fell into the hands of the victors; his brothers soon after surrendered; and the king himself was delivered in chains to Ostorius by his step-mother Cartismandua, queen of the Brigantes, under whose protection he had hoped to elude the vigilance of his pursuers.

The fame of Caractacus had already crossed the seas; and the natives of Italy were anxious to behold the man

¹ Malden or Colechester.

² Dio, lx. 779—781. Suet. in Claud. xxii. xxiv. Tac. Agrie. xiii. The Roman army brought with it several elephants, probably to terrify the natives.—Dio, ibid. The exploits of Plautius are mentioned in an inscription in his honour, which is still extant, on the mausoleum of the Plautian family, near Ponte Lucano, on the road from Rome to Tivoli.

who had braved for nine years the power of Rome. As he passed through the imperial city, he expressed his surprise that men, who possessed such palaces at home, should deem it worth their while to fight for the wretched hovels of Britain. Claudius and the empress Agrippina were seated on two lofty tribunals, with the pretorian guards on each side, and the senate and people in front, as witnesses of the spectacle. First were borne the arms and the ornaments of the British prince; next followed his wife, daughter, and brothers, bewailing with tears their unhappy fate; lastly came Caractacus himself, neither dispirited by his misfortunes, nor dismayed at this new and imposing scene. Claudius, to his own honour, received him graciously, restored him to liberty, and, if we may credit a plausible conjecture, invested him with princely authority over a portion of conquered Britain.¹ The event was celebrated at Rome with extraordinary joy. By the senate the captivity of Caractacus was compared to the captivity of Perses and Syphax: by the poets Claudius was said to have united the two worlds, and to have brought the ocean within the limits of the empire.²

The Silures, however, did not abandon themselves to despair. Taught by experience that uninstructed valour was not a match for the discipline and defensive armour of the legions, they adopted a more desultory but sanguinary mode of warfare; and contented themselves with harassing the Romans in their quarters, interrupting their communications, and surprising their detachments. If they sometimes received, they often inflicted, considerable injury; and Ostorius was so exhausted by labour and vexation, that his death was attributed to his chagrin. His successor, Aulus Didius, found himself involved in a new war. Vennius, a chieftain of the Jugantes, had married Cartismandua. Both had been faithful allies to the Romans; but the queen, after a short interval, separated from her husband, and took to her bed a Briton, named Vellacatus. Hostilities were the immediate consequence. Cartismandua, for her ancient services, claimed the aid of the Romans: the Brigantes, through hatred of the adulteress, fought for Vennius. After several battles, the queen was compelled to leave the throne to her husband, and to lead a degraded life under the protection of her allies.³

To Didius succeeded Veranius, whose early death made way for Suetonius Paulinus, a general of consummate skill and distinguished reputation. The isle of Anglesey, the nursery and principal residence of the druids, had hitherto offered a secure retreat to those priests; to whose influence and invectives was attributed the obstinate resistance of the Britons. To reduce it, Suetonius ordered his cavalry to swim across the strait, while the infantry should pass over in boats. On their approach to the sacred isle, they beheld the shore lined not only with warriors, but with bands of male and female druids. The former, with their arms outstretched to heaven, devoted the invaders to the god of war; the latter, in habits of mourning, with their hair floating in the wind, and lighted torches in their hands, ran in all directions along the

¹ Quedam civitates Cogiduno regi donatæ: (is ad nostram usque memoriam fidiissimus mansit).—Tac. Agric. xiv. Though great authorities conceive Cogidunus to have been the same person as Caractacus, I entertain a suspicion that he was the very Togidumnus whom Dio supposed to have fallen in battle.

² Tacit. Ann. xii. 31—38.

At nunc oceanus geminos interluit orbes: Pars est imperii: terminus ante fuit. Ex Catalect. Scalig. apud Camd. lix.

³ Tac. Ann. xii. 40. Hist. iii. 45. This fact is sufficient to induce a doubt of the accuracy of Cæsar (v. 14), and of Dio beach. The Romans were seized with a superstitious horror. For a moment they refused to advance: shame and the reproaches of their leader urged them to the attack. The victory was easy and bloodless. On that day the power of the druids received a shock from which it never recovered. Their altars were overturned, their sacred groves fell beneath the axe of the legionaries, and their priests and priestesses were consumed in the flames which they had kindled for the destruction of their captives.¹

But the absence of Suetonius in Anglesey was the signal of a most formidable insurrection. Prasutagus, king of the Iceni, who had long been the faithful ally of Rome, to secure the disposition of his property, had made the emperor joint heir with his own daughters. But Roman avarice was not easily defeated. The whole succession was immediately seized by Catus, the imperial procurator. Boadicea, the widow of the late king, who ventured to remonstrate, was scourged as a slave; and the chastity of her daughter was violated by the Roman officers. The unhappy princess grasped the first opportunity of revenge. The history of her wrongs reminded each individual of his own sufferings; and in a few days almost all the conquered tribes were in arms. To account for this general disaffection we are told, that the insults and oppression of the conquerors were beyond endurance; that the British youth had been forcibly conveyed to foreign countries to serve among the cohorts of auxiliaries; that, to pay the contributions, their chieftains had been compelled to borrow ten millions of drachmas² from the philosopher Seneca, by whom they were harassed with the most vexatious prosecutions; that their estates had been lately registered, and loaded with imposts; and that many of their most noble families had been reduced to indigence and slavery.³ All these causes contributed to swell the torrent which now burst on the Roman establishments. Camalodunum was the first to experience its fury. Within the walls of the colony had been erected a temple to the divinity of Claudius, the subjugator of Britain, and the natives were eager to demolish this monument of their servitude. At the first assault the town was reduced to ashes: the walls of the temple protracted the fate of the garrison only two days. Petilius marched with the ninth legion to their assistance. It was trodden under foot by the multitude of the insurgents.

By this time Suetonius had returned to London, already a populous and opulent mart.⁴ Unable to protect the town, he retired, taking with him such of the inhabitants as were willing to share his fortunes. London was soon consumed by the flames; and shortly afterwards the municipal town of Verulam experienced the same fate. The fury of the Britons treated as enemies all who had not joined in the insurrection; and those who fell not by the sword, were immolated with still greater cruelty to Andraste, the goddess of victory. The reported slaughter of seventy thousand victims, without distinction of sex or age, of rank or country, attests both the violence of their revenge, and the extent of country through which they followed the Romans.⁵

Suetonius was at last compelled to Niceus (in Sev. p. 339), who represent a community of wives as a national institution among the Britons. Perhaps the story might have arisen from the circumstance that several families were accustomed to dwell in the same hut.

¹ Tacit. Ann. xiv. 29, 30.

² About 480,000*l*.

³ Compare Tac. Ann. xiv. 31, with Dio Niceus apud Xiphil. in Ner. p. 169.

⁴ Copia negotiorum et commestuum maxime celebre.—Tac. 33.

⁵ Tac. ibid. Dio Nic. ibid. Their return his face to the enemy. Though fear had prevented the second legion from joining in his retreat, he had collected from the different garrisons ten thousand men, and had chosen a position in which he could be attacked only in front. The Britons were collected in masses around their different chieftains; their wives and children occupied a long line of carriages in the rear; and the air resounded with their cries and imprecations. The Romans, motionless and silent, permitted them to approach; and then, rushing forward in the form of a wedge, overturned everything within their reach. The battle, however, was long and fiercely maintained. Numbers on the part of the natives supplied the want of discipline, and a succession of conflicts almost exhausted the patience of the legionaries. Victorious at last, the Romans took a severe revenge. They granted no quarter: and the women and children were involved in the same carnage with the combatants. Were success to be estimated by the multitude of the slain, Tacitus was justified in comparing this with the most glorious victories of ancient Rome. He estimates the loss of the Britons at eighty thousand men. The fugitives, however, who escaped, offered to try again the fortune of war: but Boadicea, who had led them to the field, and shared the dangers of the day, refused to survive this defeat, and terminated her misfortunes by a voluntary death.¹

If this splendid action preserved the ascendancy of the Roman arms, it did not put an end to the war. A notion prevailed in the imperial court, that the obstinacy of the Britons arose from the dread which the severity of Suetonius had inspired. He was recalled; and under the milder administration of his three successors, Turpilianus, Trebellius, and Bolanus, the natives within the Roman pale were gradually inured to the yoke. But the task of tranquillizing the province, the mutinous spirit of the army, and the rival claims of competitors for the empire, prevented these governors from making any attempts against the independent portion of Britain. As soon as Vespasian had assumed the purple a new era commenced. Petilius Cerealis was ordered to reduce the Brigantes, and in the space of five years that powerful tribe was added to the subjects of the empire. Julius Frontinus was his successor; and during the three years of his government he nearly subdued the warlike nation of the Silures.²

But the reputation of preceding governors was obscured by the more splendid and more lasting fame of Cneius Julius Agricola. When that commander arrived, the army had been dismissed into winter quarters. He immediately summoned it again to the field, marched into the territory of the Ordovices, who had surprised a squadron of Roman horse; and put to the sword the greater part of that nation. Preceded by the terror of his name, he crossed over to Anglesey: the natives offered no resistance, and the sacred isle was a second time added to the empire. In the two next campaigns he gradually extended the limits of his government to the Tay. Tribe after tribe was compelled to submit; garrisons were stationed joicings were celebrated in the woods sacred to Andraste. Some of the victims were crucified, others were burnt. The female captives, after the amputation of the breasts, were hanged or impaled.—Ibid.

¹ Tac. 34—37.—Dio Nic. apud Xiphil. in Ner. p. 176. Dio has described this British heroine as a woman of lofty stature and severe countenance. Her yellow hair reached almost to the ground. She wore a plaited tunic of various colours, round her waist a chain of gold, and over these a long mantle.—p. 173.

² Tac. Ann. xiv. 37—39. Hist. i. 9, 60; ii. 97. Vit. Agric. 8, 16, 17.

in every commanding situation; and with the prospect of success was removed the principal incentive to rebellion. The fourth summer was employed in securing a strong frontier to the Roman conquests; and a line of forts from the Frith of Forth to that of the Clyde bade defiance to the inroads of the more northern Britons.¹

But Agricola aspired to more solid praise than that of conquest, and devoted his winters to the less ostentatious, but more useful, arts of peace. Sensible of the errors of his predecessors, he reformed the civil administration in all its branches, established a more equitable system of taxation; listened with kindness to the complaints of the natives, and severely punished the tyranny of inferior officers. The Britons were charmed with the mildness and justice of his government, and publicly pronounced him their benefactor. At his instigation the chieftains left their habitations in the forests, and repaired to the vicinity of the Roman stations. There they learned to admire the refinements of civilization, and acquired a taste for improvement. The use of the Roman toga began to supersede that of the British mantle; houses, baths, and temples, were built in the Roman fashion; children were instructed in the Roman language; and with the manners were adopted the vices of the Romans. In these new pursuits the spirit of independence speedily evaporated; and those hardy warriors, who had so long braved the power of the emperors, insensibly dwindled into soft and effeminate provincials.²

Ambition and curiosity now induced Agricola to transgress the boundary which he had fixed to his conquests. An Irish chieftain, expelled from his native country, had sought protection in the camp of the Romans. From him it was understood that the sister island possessed a climate and soil like those of Britain, and was inhabited by tribes of similar manners and similar dispositions. Agricola was not insensible to the glory of adding this unknown country to the provinces of the empire: but prudence forbade him to engage in a second conquest before he had completed the first, and he contented himself with obtaining possession of the western coasts of Britain; that he might be prepared to take advantage of the first opportunity which the course of events might offer.

The next year, having received the submission of the tribes in the neighbourhood of the Forth, he pushed his advances along the eastern shore. The operations of the army on land were combined with those of a numerous fleet at sea. If the sight of the shipping alarmed the natives, the Romans were also terrified by reports of the multitude and ferocity of their enemies. In the darkness of the night the Britons attacked the quarters of the ninth legion, burst into the camp, and maintained a doubtful fight within the intrenchments until the break of day disclosed the eagles of the other legions advancing to the support of their comrades. This campaign seems to have conferred little honour on the imperial arms.

Resolved to distinguish the eighth and last year of his government, Agricola assembled all his forces, and added to their number several cohorts of Britons raised among the tribes of the south. The Caledonians were apprized of their danger: and thirty thousand warriors under the command of Galgacus undertook to defend the passage of the Grampian mountains. They were discovered, divided into clans, posted one below the other on isthmus between the friths of Forth and Clyde.—Gordon's Itiner. Septent.

¹ Agricola seems to have proceeded across the Dee, through Lancashire, Westmoreland, Cumberland Annandale, to the narrow

² Tac. Agric. 18—24.

the declivity of a hill. The plain at its foot was covered with horsemen and armed chariots. Agricola drew up his army in two lines, in the first of which he placed the auxiliaries, in the other the legions. As long as they fought with missile weapons, the Britons, from their numbers, retained the advantage; but their unwieldy and unpointed swords were of little use in close action, and they were gradually driven up the hill by the steady pressure of the auxiliaries.¹ An attempt to surprise the rear of the Romans was defeated by the vigilance of the general, who charged in return the flank of the Britons, and threw them into disorder. The courage or despair of a few detached bodies protracted the conflict till night. The next morning presented a very different scene. A vast and dreary solitude had succeeded to the noise and turmoil of the preceding day: and columns of smoke rising on the verge of the horizon proved that the Britons had burned their cottages in their flight. Tenthousand Caledonians, and about four hundred Romans are said to have fallen in the battle.²

After this victory the army returned to winter quarters: the fleet pursued its voyage, and sailing round the island, arrived at the port of Sandwich, from which it had commenced the expedition. By the jealousy of Domitian, the ornaments, but not the parade, of a triumph were granted to Agricola, who having surrendered the command to his successor, Lucullus, returned to Rome, waited on his imperial master, and sunk into the obscurity of private life.³

The Roman power was now firmly established in the island. The tribes which had submitted, made no attempt to recover their independence: and the Caledonians, humbled by their last defeat, were content to roam without molestation in their native forests. The successors of Agricola, instead of conducting the legions in the field, were employed in protecting the public tranquillity, in settling the details of the provincial government, and in assimilating the state of Britain to that of the other countries which had been incorporated in the empire. A short sketch of this system will not be unacceptable to the reader.

1. The governor was denominated the Prefect or Propretor of Britain. His power was supreme within the island, but precarious in its duration, and dependent on the will of the emperor. He united in his own person every species of authority which was exercised by the different magistrates within the city of Rome. He commanded the army; he was invested with the administration of justice; and he possessed the power of substituting his own notions of equity in the place of the strict letter of the law. An authority so extensive and irresistible would frequently give birth to acts of injustice; and though the imperial court and the senate-house were open to the complaints of the natives, yet the distance of the capital, and the influence of friends, promised, or rather insured, impunity to the oppressor. In a few years, however, the exorbitant power of the prefects was confined by the emperor Hadrian, who, in his "perpetual edict," laid down a system of rules for the regulation of their conduct, and established a uniform administration of justice through all the provinces of the empire.⁴

2. Subordinate to the prefect, but appointed by the emperor, was the procurator or quaestor. It was his duty to collect the taxes, and to

¹ They had osier targets covered with skins, and long heavy swords without points, with which they were accustomed to out, but not to push.—Tac. Agric. xxxvi.

² Tac. Agric. 24—38.

³ Id. 40.

⁴ Tillem. Emp. ii. 51.

administer the revenue of the province. That revenue arose from a variety of imposts: a poll-tax, which was not confined to the living, but extended to the funerals of the dead; a tax on legacies, the sale of slaves, and purchases at auctions; the tenth part of the produce of mines; and a certain proportion of corn, hay, and cattle, which was paid either in kind or in money, at the option of the procurator.¹ He was also employed occasionally in the dishonourable office of a spy; and his reports were frequently swelled with exaggerated accounts of the riches, the power, and the ambition of the prefect. For the distance of that officer from the seat of government, and the natural strength of the island, were constant sources of suspicion to the emperors; and in the course of this history we shall see that suspicion justified by the conduct of the usurpers, who, at the head of the British legions, will assume the purple, and contend for the empire of Rome.

3. The amount of the army maintained in Britain must have varied according to circumstances. When Plautius undertook the reduction of the island, he was at the head of four legions with their auxiliaries, a force which, at a moderate calculation, would exceed fifty thousand men.² If the different military stations, which were so thickly scattered over the country, had all been garrisoned at the same time, they would have required a still greater number:³ but it is probable that, in proportion as the Roman power was established, many of them were abandoned; and we know that, during the decline of the empire, the army under the three military commanders in Britain, did not exceed twenty-two thousand men. Into the ranks of the legions none but Roman citizens could claim the privilege of admittance; but the auxiliaries were composed of provincials who had not obtained the freedom of the city, or of barbarians, whom the fate of war, or the prospect of wealth, had drawn into the imperial service. These auxiliaries nearly equalled the legionaries in number: and from the notices of ancient writers, and the inscriptions on ancient monuments, have been discovered the names of three-and-thirty cohorts of auxiliary foot, and of eleven squadrons of auxiliary horse, which were stationed in Britain.⁴ All these were composed of foreigners; for though by the law of conscription the natives were compelled to serve, they were not permitted to remain in the island. At home they might have employed their swords in asserting the independence of their country: but on the continent they were unconnected with the inhabitants: for their subsistence, they depended on the bounty of the emperor; and far from combining to subvert, were always prepared to support, the throne of their benefactor. What their number might be, is uncertain: but there exists evidence to show, that they amounted

¹ In provinces which submitted voluntarily, a tenth of the corn was exacted (frumentum decumanum): in those which were conquered, an arbitrary quantity (frumentum stipendiarium). Besides this the natives supplied the corn wanted for the army at a fixed price (frumentum emptum): and a certain quantity for the use of the governor, for which a composition was usually paid in money (frumentum restimatum).—See Murphy's Tacitus, from La Bletterie, vol. iv. p. 402.

² At that period a legion consisted of 6,100 infantry, 726 cavalry, and nearly the same number of auxiliaries.—Veget. ii. 6. Tac. Ann. iv. 5. Under the successors of Constantine the number of the legions had increased from twenty-five to one hundred and thirty-two; but their bulk had dwindled from nearly 7,000 to 1,200 men.—Pancir. ad Notit. Imp. f. 23.

³ There were in all one hundred and sixty-six stations, besides several smaller forts.—Ric. Corin. i. p. 17, 33. Whitaker's Manches. iii. 2; xi. 2.

⁴ It is not, however, improbable that the same cohort or squadron may be sometimes designated under two different names.

to at least six-and-twenty cohorts; that they were dispersed as far as Egypt and Armenia; and that some of them had acquired the surname of "Invincible," from their valour.¹

When the Roman conquests in Britain had reached their utmost extent, they were irregularly divided into six provinces under the government of pretors appointed by the prefect. The long tract of land which runs from the western extremity of Cornwall to the South Foreland in Kent, is almost separated from the rest of the island by the arm of the sea, now called the Bristol Channel, and by the course of the river Thames. This formed the most wealthy of the British provinces; and from priority of conquest or proximity of situation was distinguished by the name of Britannia Prima. Britannia Secunda comprised the present principality of Wales, with the addition of that tract which is included by the Severn in its circuitous course towards St. George's Channel. Flavia Cæsariensis was the next in order, but the first in extent. It was bounded on two sides by the former provinces, and on the two others by the Humber, the Don, and the German Ocean. To the north of the Humber lay the province of Maxima. It reached to the Eden and Tyne, and its opposite shores were washed by the western and eastern seas. Valentia followed, including the Scottish lowlands as far as the friths of Clyde and Forth. The tribes beyond the friths formed the sixth government of Vespasiana, divided from the independent Caledonians by the long chain of mountains, which rises near Dunbarton, crosses the two counties of Athol and Badenoch, and stretches beyond the Frith of Murray. But the greater part of this province was wrested at so early a period from the dominion of Rome, that it is seldom mentioned by writers, and the pretentura of Agricola has been generally considered as the northern limit of the empire in Britain.² To each of these divisions was allotted a separate government under the general superintendence of the prefect: but the interests of the rulers were most jealously separated from those of the provincials. Every Briton by his birth was excluded from all offices of trust and authority in his own country; and every holder of such office was prohibited by law from marrying a native, or purchasing property within the island.³

Throughout these provinces were scattered a great number of inhabited towns and military posts, the names of which are still preserved in the itineraries of Richard and Antoninus. They were partly of British and partly of Roman origin; and were divided into four classes, gradually descending in the scale of privilege and importance. 1. The first rank was claimed by the colonies. It had long been the policy of Rome to reward her veterans with a portion of the lands of the conquered nations; and for this purpose those situations were generally selected, which combined the double advantage of a fruitful soil, and a military position. Each colony was a miniature representation of the parent city. It adopted the same customs, was governed by the same laws, and with similar titles conferred on its magistrates a similar authority. In Britain there were nine of these establishments, two of a civil, seven of

¹ Apud Camd. introd. p. cvii.

² Ric. Corin. i. p. 15. Not. Imp. occid. f. 155. The capitals of these provinces were Richborough, Caerleon, London, York, Whithern, and Inverness. The existence of the last province of Vespasiana has been questioned: but the authority of Richard is corroborated by the testimony of Ptolemy, who mentions the military station of Pterotone or Inverness.—Ptol. viii. 2, apud Gale. Whit. Manch. i. 8; iii. 2; xi. 2.

³ See the Pandects, xxiii. tit. ii. n. 38, 57, 63. Cod. Theod. viii. tit. xv. leg. 1.

a military description.¹ In the constitution of the latter, we discover a striking similitude to the feudal tenures of later ages. The veteran received his land from the bounty of the emperor; and was obliged to enrol his sons in the army, as soon as they should attain the years of manhood. Disgrace, imprisonment, or sometimes death, was the punishment of the youth who refused to serve the benefactor of his father and family. 2. The advantages enjoyed by the colonies were nearly equalled, in some respects surpassed, by the privileges of the municipal cities; the inhabitants of which were exempted from the operation of the imperial statutes, and with the title of Roman citizens, possessed the right of choosing their own decuriones or magistrates, and of enacting their own laws. Privileges so valuable were reserved for the reward of extraordinary merit, and Britain could boast of only two municipia, Verulam and York.² But the jus Latii, or Latian right, as it conferred more partial advantages, was bestowed with greater liberality. Ten of the British towns had obtained it from the favour of different emperors, and were indulged with the choice of their own magistrates, who, at the expiration of the year, resigned their offices, and claimed the freedom of Rome.³ That freedom was the great object of provincial ambition; and by the expedient of annual elections, it was successively conferred on almost all the members of each Latin corporation. 4. The remaining towns were stipendiary, compelled, as the term imports, to pay tribute, and governed by Roman officers, who received their appointment from the pretor. These distinctions were, however, gradually abolished. Antoninus granted to every provincial of rank and opulence the freedom of the city: Caracalla extended the indulgence to the whole body of the natives.⁴

Though Agricola had defeated, he had not been able to subdue, the Caledonians. After his departure they continued to insult the Roman power; frequently crossed the line of forts between the two friths; and by their successful example, rekindled the flame of independence in the breasts of many among their countrymen. In less than thirty years the state of Britain had become so precarious, as to require the presence of the emperor Hadrian. Of his exploits history is silent; but on the testimony of medals and inscriptions, we may believe that he expelled the barbarians, and recovered the provinces which had been lost.⁵ If, however, his victories have been forgotten, his memory has been preserved by a military work, which was executed under his direction, and has hitherto defied the ravages of time. Convinced by experience that the pretentura thrown up by Agricola could not confine the northern tribes, he resolved to oppose a second barrier to their incursions, by drawing a ditch and rampart across the island, from the Solway frith on the western, to the mouth of the Tyne on the eastern coast. This mighty fortification measured in length more than sixty of our miles; and strong bodies of troops were permanently stationed at short intervals on the whole extent of the line.⁶

But the tranquillity which had been

¹ Richborough, London, Colchester, Bath, Gloucester, Caerleon, Chester, Lincoln, and Chesterfield.—Ric. Corin. i. p. 36.

² Ric. Corin. i. p. 36.

³ Inverness, Perth, Dunbarton, Carlisle, Catterick, Blackrode, Cirencester, Salisbury, Caister in Lincolnshire, and Slack in Longwood.—Ric. ibid.

⁴ Tillem. Emp. ii. 103. Hence he is thus addressed by Rutilius:—

Urben fecisti quod prius orbis erat.

Rutil. Itin. v. 68.

⁵ See Speed, 96; Camd. introd. lxxix.

⁶ Spartian. in Hadrian. p. 290. The valium may be traced from Burgh on the sands to the town of Newcastle, avoiding the established by Hadrian, was repeatedly disturbed during the reign of his successor, Antoninus. On the north of the vallum the six tribes of the Mæstæ re-asserted their independence; on the south the Brigantes took up arms, and invaded the territory of the Ordovices. Lollius Urbicus was appointed propretor of Britain. He chastised the Brigantes, subdued the Mæstæ, and, in imitation of Hadrian, carried a similar fortification across the isthmus, from Caer-riden or Kinneil on the Forth, to Alclud on the Clyde, a distance of more than thirty-six miles. In honour of the emperor, it was called the vallum of Antoninus; and from numerous inscriptions which have been preserved, we learn the names of the different corps by which it was raised, and the different portions of work which were respectively allotted to each.¹

Hostilities were now become habitual between the Caledonians and the Romans. Urged by national animosity and the love of plunder, these intractable barbarians annually assaulted the vallum of Antoninus, often eluded the vigilance, or overpowered the opposition, of the guards, and spread devastation over the province. But in the reign of Commodus their incursions assumed a more formidable appearance, and the discontent of the legions alarmed the emperor for the safety of Britain. Ulpius Marcellus, a soldier of approved valour and unsullied integrity, was made propretor. He restored the discipline of the army, and drove the Caledonians back to their native mountains. But his services were requited with ingratitude. By his severity he incurred the hatred of a seditious soldiery, while his glory excited the jealousy of a dissolute prince. From the swords of the former he escaped with difficulty; Commodus recalled him from his command, and reluctantly abstained from depriving him of life.²

But the British legions soon made a trial of the resolution, or the weakness, of the emperor. They sent a deputation of fifteen hundred men to demand the head of the minister Perennis. Without opposition these dangerous petitioners marched through Gaul and Italy, and were met at the gates of Rome by Commodus himself. To that prince, immersed in pleasure, and reckless of blood, the life of a favourite was a trivial object. He surrendered Perennis to their revenge; the unhappy victim was scourged and beheaded, and his wife and daughters were immolated on his remains.³

The government of Britain was next conferred on Clodius Albinus. His birth and abilities awakened the jealousy of his imperial master, who, either with the view of securing his fidelity, or, as is more probable, of trying his ambition, offered him the rank and authority of Cæsar. Albinus had the prudence to decline the insidious present; but after the death of Commodus, and the ephemeral reigns of Pertinax and Julian, he willingly accepted the same dignity from the emperor Severus. It soon, how-mountains, and winding along the valleys. The ditch appears to have been eleven feet in breadth, and nine in depth: the rampart, at the present day, rises in some parts six feet above the original surface. Besides this, two aggeres or mounds of earth, one on the north, the other on the south, run the whole length, in lines parallel to the ditch, at the distance of nearly twenty feet. It is probable, that the mound to the south was a military road; and that the original work of Hadrian, like that of Antoninus between the friths, consisted of no more than the ditch, the rampart, and the road. The agger on the north might be afterwards added as a military way for the wall of Severus, when the vallum could be no longer considered as a work of defence.

¹ Pausan. in Arcad. l. viii. p. 698. Capitol. in Anton. p. 297. Horsley, Brit. Rom. p. 160. Henry ii. App. ix. 476.

² Dio apud Xiphil. in Commodo, p. 286, 287.

³ Ibid. p. 237. Lamprid. in Com. p. 311. Zonar. p. 209.

ever, appeared, that with all the parade of friendship, Severus was a secret and mortal enemy; and Albinus, by the advice of his friends, assumed the imperial purple, and led the British legions into Gaul. The two armies, amounting to one hundred thousand men, fought in the plain of Trevoux, near Lyons. At first the cause of Albinus was seen to triumph. Severus disappeared from the field; but he soon returned with a fresh body of men, renewed the battle, and obtained the victory. The British Cæsar paid with his head the forfeit of his ambition.¹

Severus was now undisputed master of the empire. To abolish the exorbitant power of the prefect of Britain, he divided the island into two governments, bestowing the one on Heracianus, and the other on Virius Lupus.² The latter with an army of new levies was unable to withstand the united efforts of the Mæætæ and Caledonians, and was compelled to purchase with money a precarious respite from their incursions. The expedient, though it procured a temporary forbearance, invited them to a repetition of the attempt; and Lupus, wearied with continued hostilities, solicited the presence of the emperor, and the aid of a numerous army.³

Though Severus was advanced in years, and declining in health, he cheerfully obeyed the summons of his lieutenant. He was accompanied by his two sons, Caracalla and Geta: to the younger he committed the civil government of the province; to Caracalla he assigned a part in the projected expedition. When the army moved from York, the selection of the commanders, the number of the legions and auxiliary cohorts, and the long train of carriages laden with provisions and implements of war, proclaimed the determination of the emperor to subdue, if not to exterminate, all the rebellious tribes in the north. The Britons were but ill provided against so formidable an invasion. They possessed no other defensive armour than a narrow target. Their weapons were a dirk, an unwieldy sword hanging from the waist by an iron chain, and a short lance, from one extremity of which was suspended a bell. But they were aided by the nature of the country, abounding in mountains, lakes, and forests; by constitutions inured to fatigue, hunger, and every privation; by habits of running, swimming, and wading through rivers and morasses; and above all, by a contempt of danger, and an unconquerable love of freedom. The progress of the Romans was constantly interrupted by the necessity of opening roads through the woods, of throwing bridges over the rivers, and of erecting causeways across the marshes. It was in vain that Severus sought for an enemy in front. The natives had wisely divided themselves into detachments, which hung on the flanks of the Romans, watched every advantage, and often inflicted a sudden and severe wound on the long and encumbered line of their enemies. Still the emperor, regardless of his losses, and unappalled by difficulties, pressed forward till he reached the Frith of Cromarty, where he condescended to accept the offers of submission which he had formerly refused; and, that he might appear to punish the obstinacy of the natives, exacted the nominal surrender of a part of their territory. But this trivial advantage had been dearly purchased, and the number of the Romans, who perished by fatigue, by disease, and by

¹ Herodian, iii. 16—23. Dio apud Xiphil. in Sever. p. 322—324.

² Εἰς δύο ἡγεμονίας.—Herod. iii. 24.

Spartan. in Sever. p. 320. Inscriptions in Speed, p. 139, by mistake for 111.

³ Herod. iii. 46.

the sword, has been estimated at fifty thousand.¹

When Severus returned to York, he had leisure to devise means for the future security of the southern provinces. From what he had seen, he was convinced that no rampart of turf could resist the assaults of these active and persevering barbarians; and he determined to confine their incursions by raising a solid wall of stone a few paces to the north of the vallum of Hadrian. In the neighbourhood of the sea it preserved a parallel direction; but as it approached the higher ground, leaving the work of that emperor to wind its circuitous course along the valleys, it boldly ascended the most lofty eminences, and ran along the margin of the most abrupt precipices. Its height was twelve feet;² its breadth at the foundation varied from two to three yards. In front was sunk a ditch of the same dimensions with that of Hadrian: and for its protection were assigned four squadrons and fourteen cohorts, composing an army of ten thousand men, quartered in eighteen stations along the line of the wall. By the historian of Severus, this stupendous erection is pronounced the principal glory of his reign: by the traveller of the present day its remains are viewed with feelings of astonishment and delight.³

Scarcely had the Romans evacuated the territory of the Caledonians and Maete, when information was brought to Severus, that the barbarians had recommenced hostilities. His infirmities had been so much increased by the fatigue of the late campaign, that he was no longer able to join the army. He gave the command to Caracalla, with an injunction to exterminate the whole race without mercy. But that prince had a far different object in view—to exclude his brother Geta from the succession. Instead of marching against the Britons, he endeavoured to gain the affection of the troops, by indulgence and donatives; and, as soon as his father had expired at York, renewed the peace, disbanded the army, and returned to Rome.⁴

History is little more than a record of the miseries inflicted on the many by the passions of a few. If then, for more than seventy years from the death of Severus, Britain has escaped the notice of the ancient annalists, we may infer that they were years of comparative tranquillity and happiness. The northern tribes respected the strength of the new fortification, and the valour of the army by which it was guarded: and the natives of the south, habituated from their infancy to submission, bore without impatience the yoke, which had pressed so heavily on their free-born fathers. The rest of the empire was convulsed by the claims of the numerous competitors, known by the name of the thirty tyrants; and from coins, which have been occasionally discovered in the island, it is supposed that Posthumus, Lollianus, Victorinus, Tetricus, Bonosus, and Elitianus were successively acknowledged in Britain. If the inference be accurate, the silence of history shows, that their authority was admitted without opposition, and not established at the point of the sword, as it was in the other provinces. Probably Britain constantly followed the fortune of Gaul.

This distracted state of the empire had opened new prospects to the barbarians, who, under the appellations of Franks and Saxons, possessed the coast from the mouth of the Rhine to the extremity of the Cimbric Chersonesus. They swept into their

¹ Dio apud Xiphil. in Severo, p. 340. Herod. iii. 46—49.

² Bede, Hist. i. 12.

³ Notit. imp. Pancirol. f. 176, 177. Maximum decus.—Spart. in Severo, 321.

⁴ Dio, p. 342. Herod. ibid.

own ports the commerce of the narrow seas, and insulted by their predatory expeditions the shores of Gaul and Britain. To chastise or restrain their insolence, the command of a powerful fleet, with the title of Count of the Saxon shore, was given by the emperors Dioclesian and Maximian to Carausius, an experienced officer, and a Menapian by birth. His conduct soon awakened suspicion. The pirates continued their depredations with impunity; a portion of their spoil was regularly surrendered to Carausius; and the money was employed in debauching the loyalty of the mariners. Maximian prepared to punish his perfidy. But the Menapian unexpectedly fortified Boulogne, concluded an alliance with the barbarians, sailed to Britain, induced the army and fleet to espouse his cause, and assuming with the imperial purple the name of Augustus, set at defiance the whole power of Rome.

The reign of this adventurer was fortunate and glorious. The Caledonians were compelled to flee before his arms; his authority was acknowledged on the western coast of Gaul; and a numerous fleet carried the terror of his name to the entrance of the Mediterranean. It was not, however, to be expected, that the emperors would tamely acquiesce in his usurpation. At first indeed they thought it more prudent to admit him as their colleague: but when they had adopted the two Cæsars Galerius and Constantius, they assigned to the latter the task of wresting Britain from his dominion. Constantius began the attempt with the siege of Boulogne. By his orders the mouth of the harbour was obstructed by a mound of stones; and the garrison, cut off from any assistance from Britain, was, after an obstinate resistance, compelled to surrender. This loss might grieve, but did not dishearten Carausius. He was still master of the sea, and at the head of a numerous army. But, while he was employed in providing against a distant danger, he fell a victim to domestic treachery; and in the eighth year of his reign was murdered at York by Allectus, a minister who had abused his confidence, and dreaded his resentment.

Allectus enjoyed during three years the reward of his treachery. The time was spent by Constantius in preparing a fleet which might safely transport his troops to the island. To distract the attention of the enemy, it was divided into two squadrons, of which one under his command was stationed at Boulogne, the other, under that of the prefect Asclepiodotus, in the mouth of the Seine. The latter, owing to the impatience of the mariners, was the first which put to sea; and sailing under the cover of a fog, passed unobserved by the British fleet near the Isle of Wight, and reached without opposition the adjacent coast. The Cæsar himself with a still more powerful armament directed his course to the shore of Kent; and at his landing received the pleasing intelligence that Allectus was dead. On the first news of the arrival of Asclepiodotus, the usurper had hastened towards the spot: but the greater part of his forces were unable to equal his speed; and with his guard, a band of Franks, he was speedily overwhelmed by the Romans. Nor was this the only instance of the good fortune of the Cæsar. A division of his fleet, which had separated in the dark, entered the Thames, and advanced without meeting an enemy to the neighbourhood of London. At that moment a body of auxiliaries in the pay of Allectus, hearing of his death, began to plunder the city. It was saved from destruction by the accidental arrival of the Romans: and Constantius himself was soon afterwards hailed by the inhabitants as their sovereign and deliverer. He immediately restored the imperial authority: Britain became his favourite residence; and the natives enjoyed the benefit of a mild and equitable administration, till their happiness was disturbed by religious persecution.¹

At the distance of so many ages it is impossible to discover by whom Christianity was first preached in the island. Some writers have ascribed that province to St. Peter; others have preferred the rival claim of St. Paul: but both opinions, improbable as they are in themselves, rest on the most slender evidence; on testimonies, which are many of them irrelevant, all ambiguous and unsatisfactory. It is it is however certain that at a very early period there were Christians in Britain: nor is it difficult to account for the circumstance, from the intercourse which had long subsisted between the island and Rome. Within a very few years from the ascension of Christ, the church of Rome had attained great celebrity: soon afterwards it attracted the notice and was honoured with the enmity of Claudius and Nero.² Of the Romans whom at that period choice or necessity conducted to Britain, and of the Britons who were induced to visit Rome, some would of course become acquainted with the professors of the gospel, and yield to the exertions of their zeal. Both Pomponia Græcina, the wife of the proconsul Plautius, the first who made any permanent conquest in the island, and Claudia, a British lady, who had married the senator Pudens, are, on rather probable grounds, believed to have been Christians.³ But whether it was owing to the piety of these, or of other individuals,⁴ that the doctrine of Christianity was first introduced among the Britons, it appears to have made proselytes, and to have proceeded with a silent but steady pace towards the extremity of the island. The attention of the Roman officers was absorbed in the civil and military duties of their stations; and while the blood of the Christians flowed in the other provinces of the empire, the Britons were suffered to practise the new religion without molestation. There is even evidence that the knowledge of the gospel was not confined to the subjects of Rome. Before the close of the second century, it had penetrated among the independent tribes of the north.⁵

It might have been expected that the British writers would have preserved the memory of an event so important in their eyes as the conversion of their fathers. But their traditions have been so embellished or disfigured by fiction, that without collateral evidence, it is hardly possible to distinguish in them what is real from that which is imaginary. After deducting from the account of Nennius and his brethren every improbable circumstance, we may believe that the authority conferred by the emperor Claudius on Cogidunus, was continued in his family; that Lucius (Levermaur, or the great light), one of his near descendants, was a believer in the gospel; that he sent to Rome Fagan and Dervan to be more perfectly instructed in the Christian faith; and

¹ Paneger. vet. p. 177, 180. Eutrop. ix. p. 659. Aurel. Vict. in Constan.

² Epist. to Romans, i. 8. Suet. in Claud. xxv. Tac. Ann. xv. 44.

³ For Pomponia, see Tacitus, Ann. xiii. 32; for Claudia compare St. Paul, 2 Tim. iv. 21, with Martial, epig. ii. 54, iv. 13.

⁴ Nothing can be less probable in itself, nor less supported by ancient testimony, than the opinion that Britain was converted by oriental missionaries. The only foundation on which it rests, is, that in the seventh century the Britons did not keep Easter on the same day as the church of Rome. That, however, they did so in the beginning of the fourth century, is plain from Eusebius (Vit. con. iii. 19), Socrates (Hist. v. 22), and the council of Arles (Spelman, p. 40, 42).

⁵ Britanniarum inaccessa Romanis loca, Christo vero subdita.—Tertul. adver. Jud. c. vii. p. 189, ed. Rigalt.

that these envoys, having received ordination from Pope Eleutherius, at their return, under the influence of their patron, increased the number of the proselytes by their preaching, and established the British, after the model of the continental churches.¹ But independently of such authority, we have undoubted proof that the believers were numerous, and that a regular hierarchy had been instituted, before the close of the third century. For by contemporary writers the church of Britain is always put on an equality with the churches of Spain and Gaul; and in one of the most early of the western councils, that of Arles in 314, we meet with the names of three British bishops, Eborius of York, Restitutius of London, and Adelphius of Lincoln.²

It has been observed that the British Christians had hitherto escaped the persecutions to which their continental brethren were repeatedly exposed. But in the beginning of the fourth century, Dioclesian and Maximian determined to avenge the disasters of the empire on the professors of the gospel: and edicts were published, by which the churches in every province were ordered to be demolished, and the refusal to worship the gods of paganism was made a crime punishable with death. Though Constantius might condemn, he dared not forbid the execution of the imperial mandate: but he was careful at the same time to show by his conduct his own opinion of religious persecution. Assembling around him the Christian officers of his household, he communicated to them the will of the emperors, and added, that they must determine to resign their employments, or to abjure the worship of Christ. If some among them preferred their interest to their religion, they received the reward which their perfidy deserved. The Cæsar dismissed them from his service, observing that he would never trust the fidelity of men who had proved themselves traitors to their God.³ But the moderation of Constantius did not restrain the zeal of the inferior magistrates. The churches in almost every district were levelled with the ground: and of the Christians many fled for safety to the forests and mountains, many suffered with constancy both torture and death. Gildas has preserved the names of Julius and Aaron, citizens of Caerleon upon Usk; and the memory of Alban, the proto-martyr of Britain, was long celebrated both in his own country and among the neighbouring nations. But within less than two years Dioclesian and Maximian resigned the purple; Constantius and Galerius assumed the title of emperors; and the freedom of religious worship was restored to the Christian inhabitants of the island.⁴

Constantius, while he was yet in an inferior situation, had married Helena, a native of Bithynia according to some writers, the daughter of a British prince, if we may believe our national historians. When he was raised to the dignity of Cæsar, he was compelled to repudiate Helena for Theodora, the daughter-in-law of Maximian; but

¹ The substance of this account is confirmed by Bede, who twice in his History, and once in his Chronicle, tells us that Lucius, a British prince, sent messengers to Rome to Pope Eleutherius, for instruction in the Christian faith. He places this message in the short interval between the death of the emperor Commodus (Chron. Op. Min. 173) and that of the emperor Aurelius (Hist. i. c. 4); that is, between the years 169 and 180. It is difficult to reconcile this date with that which he assigns to the accession of Aurelius, namely, 156. But that number is evidently an error, arising perhaps from the negligence of some copyist, who wrote clvi. for clxi., the correct date.

² Spelm. Conc. 42, 45. Labbe, Conc. i. 1430. Eusebius, v. 23. Socrates, v. 21. Col. Lond. should be Col. Lind. Lindum or Lindicolinum, Lincoln.

³ Euseb. Vit. Cons. i. 16. Sozom. i. 6. Lact. de Mortib. Persec. 15, 16.

⁴ Gild. vii. viii. Bed. i. vii.

Helena had already borne him a son in Britain,¹ the celebrated Constantine, on whom posterity has bestowed the epithet of the "great." The young prince was educated an honourable hostage in the court, first of Dioclesian, and then of Galerius: but on the report that his father's health was rapidly declining, he snatched a favourable moment to escape, and maiming at every post the horses which were not necessary for his flight, contrived to retard the speed of his pursuers. He reached York a few days before Constantius expired; was recommended by him to the affection of the soldiery; and assumed, with their approbation, the titles of Cæsar and Augustus. The sequel of his story, and the long course of victories by which he united the whole empire under his own authority, are subjects foreign from these sheets: but it will be necessary to notice an important alteration which he made in the government of Britain.²

Dioclesian had divided the whole empire into four parts, under himself, Maximian, and the two Cæsars. When Constantine became sole emperor, he adopted a similar partition under four pretorian prefects. At the same time new titles and employments were devised; and throughout the whole gradation of office, the military was jealously separated from the civil administration. By this arrangement Britain was placed under the jurisdiction of the prefect of the Gauls, whose authority extended from the wall of Antoninus to the southern limits of Mauritania Tingitana. His deputy with the title of vicar of Britain resided at York: while the subordinate charge of the provinces was intrusted to the two consulars of Valentia and Maxima, and the three presidents of Flavia, Britannia Prima, and Britannia Secunda. The administration of justice, and of the finances, was continued in the hands of these ministers: but the command of the army was divided among three military officers, who acknowledged for their superior the master of the cavalry or infantry stationed on the banks of the Rhine. They were distinguished by the titles of the duke of Britain, whose command reached from the northern boundary to the Humber; the count of the Saxon shore, whose duty it was to guard the coast, from the Humber to the Land's End in Cornwall; and the count of Britain, to whom were subject all the other garrisons in the island.³

Under Constantine and his sons Britain enjoyed more than fifty years of tranquillity. The aggressions of the barbarians were repressed; and industry and commerce were encouraged. The first check was given to the public prosperity by the cruelty and avarice of Paulus, a Spanish notary. He had been sent to the island with a commission from the emperor Constantius to inquire into the conduct of the officers, who, during the general defection of the western armies, had adhered to the usurper Magnentius. Paulus was eminently skilled in all the arts of rapacity and chicanery; with him wealth was a sufficient presumption of guilt; and no man, whose possessions might fill the coffers of the notary and his imperial master, was ever acquitted at his tribunal. Martin, the vicar of Britain, had lamented, and sometimes interposed to prevent, these iniquitous proceedings. But he was informed that a deep scheme had been laid to involve him in the common delinquency; and, impelled by despair, he made an attempt on the life of the notary. The stroke was parried; and Martin instantly plunged his sword into his own heart. His real or pretended accomplices were punished with torture and confiscation, exile or death; and Paulus continued his career regardless of the hatred and imprecations of the natives. By Constantius he was applauded for his fidelity: Julian, the succeeding emperor, commanded him to be burnt alive.¹

¹ Tu nobiles illic oriendo fecisti.—Paneg. veter. p. 192; item, p. 207.

² Zosim. ii. 78, 79. Philostorg. i. p. 477.

³ Zosim. ii. 109, 110. Tillem. iv. 117. Not. Imp. f. 155, 161, 162, 176, 177.

While Julian held with the title of Cæsar the prefecture of Gaul, an event occurred which proves the great resources of Britain at this period. The Franks, Saxons, and Alemanni had previously crossed to the left bank of the Rhine, laid waste an extensive tract of country, reduced to ashes forty towns, and carried the inhabitants into captivity. By repeated victories the Cæsar compelled the barbarians to restore their prisoners: his next object was to provide the multitude with food, in a country which for years had been desolate. The granaries of Britain offered an immediate and plentiful supply. A fleet of eight hundred small vessels was collected in the mouths of the Rhine; repeated voyages were made to the British coasts: the cargoes were conveyed in lighters up the river; and the almost famished inhabitants received an ample provision of corn both to sow their lands, and to support themselves till the following harvest.² Nor was the island equal only to a temporary supply. It exported annually great quantities of corn to the continent.³

It is remarkable that from this period, the Caledonians and Maetæ, tribes which for two centuries had been the terror of the civilized Britons, disappeared without any ostensible cause from the page of history: and their places are supplied by the Picts and Scots, who, though differing from them in name, are described as barbarians equally savage in disposition and equally addicted to invasion and rapine.⁴ Of the origin of these two nations, which appear to start suddenly into existence in the course of the fourth century, many learned but fanciful theories have been invented. 1. To me it seems manifest that the Picts were, under a new denomination, the very same people, whom we have hitherto called Maetæ and Caledonians.⁵ The name of Caledonians properly belonged to the natives of that long but narrow strip of land, which stretches from Loch Fyne on the western, to the Frith of Tain on the eastern coast: but it had been extended by the Romans to all the kindred and independent clans which lay between them and the northern extremity of the island. In the fourth century the mistake was discovered and rectified: and from that time not only the Caledonians, but their southern neighbours, the five tribes of the Maetæ, began to be known by the generic appellation of Picts, a word derived perhaps from the national

¹ Amm. Marcel. xiv. 12; xx. 2.

² Zosim. iii. 145.

³ Amm. Marcel. xviii. 2, p. 204, edit. Gronov. Liban. orat. x. tom. ii. p. 281.

⁴ See Gild. c. 25.

⁵ This appears, 1. Because we have no evidence of the extirpation or emigration of the ancient tribes: 2. Because the character of the Picts is the same as that given of the Caledonians by Herodian, Dio, and Solinus. They lived by rapine: they went almost naked (Gild. 15); they punctured the figures of animals on their bodies (Claud.

de Bello Get. 165): 3. Because Eumenius, the first who mentions them, numbers the Caledonians with the other Picts (Eum. Paneg. Constau. p. 235): 4. Because Ammianus Marcellinus (lib. xxvii. p. 520), about eighty years after Eumenius, divides the Picts into the Dicaledones, confessedly the Caledonians, and the Vecturiones, who dwelt in the vicinity of the river Tay.—Ptol. viii. 3. Ric. Cor. i. 6. The territory of the Picts extended from the northern ocean as far as the south of Galloway.—Bed. iii. 4.

custom of painting the body,¹ more probably from the name which they bore in their own language. 2. The Scots came undoubtedly from Ireland, which, like its sister island, appears to have been colonized by adventurers from different countries. Thus we meet with tribes of Damnii, Volantii, Brigantes, and Cangii, names which point out a British origin; of Menapii and Cauci, descended from the parent tribes in Belgium and Germany, and of Ibarni and Concani, who seem to have emigrated from Spain.² These were scattered on different points of the coast; while the interior was held by numerous clans of the Scoti,³ many of whom, in the fourth century, united with the Attacotti, a kindred clan in the neighbourhood of Loch Lomond, to plunder the rich provinces of the Roman Britons. But the Scots soon aspired to something more permanent than plunder. From the north of Ireland the passage was short and inviting: hordes of adventurers followed each other; settlements were obtained from the friendship, or extorted from the weakness, of the Picts; and at last the strangers acquired so marked a superiority over the indigenous tribes, as to impart the name of Scotland to the northern division of Britain.⁴ It was long, however, before the two nations were blended in one people. We find the Picts distinguished from the Scots as late as the twelfth century.⁵

In the reign of Constantius the Picts and Scots entered the Roman province in considerable numbers. The Cæsar Julian could not be spared from Gaul: and Lupicinus, whom he sent as his deputy, did not venture to meet the invaders. This confession of weakness incited them to repeat their inroads; and at each repetition they penetrated farther into the country. They maintained spies in the Roman army; they tempted the fidelity of the garrisons; and they seduced many of the foreign auxiliaries to join them in the pursuit of plunder. At length the emperor Valentinian was alarmed for the safety of the island. Fallofaudes, the Roman general, had been slain by treachery; Nectarides, the count of the Saxon shore, had fallen

¹ Nec falso nomine Pictos Edomuit.—Claud. in iii. consul. Honor. 54.

² Ptol. viii. 2. Ric. Corn. i. 8. Dionysius places a Spanish colony also in the Scilly islands.—Dion Perierg. v. 563.

Ἰβάρνοι ναίουσιν ἄγανοὶ παῖδες Ἰβήρων.

As the Roman arms never penetrated into Ireland, the ancients may have entertained very false notions of its inhabitants. By Diodorus (v. 355), Strabo (iv. 201), Mela (iii. 286), and Solinus (xii. 42), they are described as cannibals, and the most barbarous of the human race. But from Tacitus we learn that the ports of Ireland were frequented by merchants, and that in manners and disposition the natives resembled the Britons.—Vit. Agric. xxiv.

³ In the fourth century, they were universally known by the name of Scots (Scotice gentes—Porphyr. apud S. Hieron. ad Ctesiph. iv. 481). Thus Claudian, speaking of their depredations, says:

Me juvat Stilicho, totam cum Scotus Iernem Movit, et infesto spumavit remige Tethys.
De Laud. Stil. ii. v. 240.

Scotorum cumulos flevit glacialis Ierne.
In consul. iv. Honor. v. 33.

The island itself was called Scotia. Scotia eadem et Hibernia—cujus partes priores Iberiam intendunt, unde et Ibernia dicta: Scotia autem, quod ab Scotorum gentibus colitur, appellata.—Isid. Orig. xiv. 123. See also Orosius (i. 2), Æthicus (Cosmog. 507), Ravennas Geographus (Galo. i. 748), and Bede (Hæc autem proprie patria Scotorum est.—Hist. i. 1). It is not improbable that the Scoti were the most numerous tribe in the interior of the island, and a division of the great Celtic family of the Cotti. The language of the Waldenses, the natives of the valleys amid the Cottian Alps, bears to this day a great affinity to the vernacular tongues of Ireland and Scotland. See Chaubert's Oratio Domin. and Pinkerton's Dissert. p. 84.

⁴ Loarn, Fergus, and Angus, the sons of Erc, a chieftain of Dalraida, in Ulster, settled in the isthmus of Cantire in 503. From them the Scottish kings claimed their descent. See Dr. O'Connor, Proleg. i. 128; ii. 83.

⁵ Ric. Hagul. 291, 316.

in battle; and the flames of devastation spread along the right bank of the Thames. First the steward of the imperial household, then Jovinus, and lastly Theodosius, were appointed to the command. That celebrated officer, with the flower of the Gallic army, landed at Richborough, and, having divided his troops into several corps, attacked and defeated the marauding parties of the barbarians. He entered London in triumph, and spent a few weeks in making preparations for new victories. The deserters were induced by an act of amnesty to rejoin their standards; the ancient discipline of the army was revived; supplies and reinforcements were provided; and, on the recommencement of hostilities, the invaders were taught in several bloody encounters to respect the bravery of the troops, and the talents of the general. They sullenly retired beyond the ancient limits of the empire; and Theodosius applied himself to re-establish the former system of government. The political and financial departments he confided to the vicar Civilis: and as commander of the army, repaired the fortifications, placed garrisons in the military stations, and restored the province of Valentia, which had long been abandoned. When he left the island, his services were attested by the gratitude of the natives, who accompanied him in crowds to the sea-shore; and by the acknowledgment of his sovereign, who loaded him with distinguished honours.¹

Gratian succeeded his father Valentinian in the empire, and invested with the purple Theodosius the younger, the son of the deliverer of Britain. There was at the time in the island an officer, named Maximus, of great abilities, and of greater ambition.²

Inflamed with jealousy by the promotion of one who had been his equal, he began to intrigue with the soldiery; and artfully extorted from their gratitude or their credulity an offer of the title of Augustus. It was not without apparent reluctance that he yielded to their entreaties: but his subsequent conduct betrayed his real sentiments. Not content with the possession of Britain, he aspired to the whole of the western empire. At the head of the British army he sailed to the mouth of the Rhine; the murder of Gratian gave him possession of Gaul; and, by the precipitate flight of Valentinian, the greater part of Italy was compelled to submit to his authority. He reigned with dignity, and severely chastised the Picts and Scots, who attempted to renew their inroads. Theodosius received his image, and acknowledged his title; but roused at last by shame and apprehension, took the field against the usurper. On the banks of the Save, in Pannonia, the first shock was given to the power of Maximus; and the city of Aquileia soon afterwards saw him stripped of the imperial ornaments, and beheaded by order of his victorious opponent. The Britons, who had followed his standard, never revisited their country: and the native writers lament the defenceless state in which it was left by their absence, exposed to the insults of its inveterate enemies.³

This favourable opportunity did not escape the vigilance of the Picts and Scots. They experienced only a feeble resistance from the small force that remained in the island, and returned home laden with the plunder of the provinces. Their repeated inroads impelled the Britons to lay their dis-

¹ Amm. Mar. xxvii. c. 8; xxviii. c. 3. Claud. in iv. Hon. v. 28. Theodosius ab Augusta profectus, quam veteres appellavere Lundinium.—Amm. Mar. ibid.

² Maximus is called a Spaniard by Zosimus (iv. 247), a Briton by Socrates (v. 11) and Gildas (c. x.), the Robber of Richborough by Ausonius (Latro Rhotupinus.—De clar. Urb. vii. p. 1301, apud Poet. vet.).

³ Prosper. in Chron. an. 387. Sozom. Hist. vii. p. 721. Gildas, c. 11. Nennius, xliii.

tressed situation before the imperial court, probably through the means of Chrysantus the vicar, whose administration is mentioned with applause: and Stilicho, the master of the infantry and cavalry, despatched to their assistance a body of troops, which repelled the invaders, and confined them within their own territories.¹

But the great fabric of the Roman power was now shaken to its foundation. Hordes of barbarians, under different denominations, issuing from the unknown regions of the east and the north, had depopulated the fairest of the provinces; and a torrent of Goths, Vandals, and Alans, under the celebrated Alaric, had poured from the summit of the Julian Alps into the flourishing plains of Italy. It became necessary to recall the troops from the extremities to defend the heart of the empire; and the cohorts which had been stationed along the walls in Britain, fought and triumphed under the command of Stilicho in the bloody battle of Pollentia.² After the retreat of Alaric, the British forces seem to have returned to the island, and to have driven back the Picts, who had taken advantage of their absence to plunder the neighbouring province. But within two or three years the German nations bursting into Gaul, spread devastation from one extremity to the other; and the legions in Britain, cut off from all communication with the emperor Honorius, determined to elect an emperor for themselves. The purple was bestowed on Marcus, one of their officers, who soon lost his life in a sedition of the soldiery. The next object of their choice was Gratian, a native of one of the British municipia, who, at the end of four months, experienced the fate of his predecessor. This dangerous pre-eminence was, however, still an object of competition. Constantine, a soldier in the ranks, with no other pretensions than his name, offered himself to their suffrages. He was proclaimed Augustus, led them to Boulogne, and with the assistance of some Roman corps, which lay dispersed in the neighbourhood, cleared the province of the barbarians. His son Constans, who is said to have worn the monastic habit at Winchester, was named Cæsar, and hastened to take possession of Spain. But their prosperity was of very short duration. The son was put to death at Vienne by Geron-tius, one of his own officers; and the father was beheaded at Arles by the order of Constantius, who commanded the forces of Honorius.³

While Constantine was thus hastening to his ruin, Britain had been the theatre of an important revolution. The natives, left without a military force, and exposed to the inroads of their enemies, determined to reject an authority which was unable to afford them protection. They deposed the Roman magistrates, proclaimed their own independence, took up arms, and with the spirit of freemen, drove the barbarians out of their territories.⁴ When the intelligence reached Ravenna, Honorius, the legitimate emperor, wrote to the states of Britain, "to provide for their own defence." By this ambiguous expression he has been thought to have released them from their allegiance: perhaps his only object was to authorize their present efforts, that he might thus reserve a claim to their future obedience.⁵

It would be interesting to delineate the conduct of the natives on this memorable occasion, and accurately to exhibit the causes which transferred the greater part of this island from

¹ Compare Gildas (c. 12) and Bede (i. 12) with Claudian de Laudibus Stilichonis, ii. ver. 247.

² Claudian, de Bello Get. v. 416.

³ Zosim. vi. p. 371—376.

⁴ Id. 376.

⁵ Id. 381.

the milder dominion of the Romans to the exterminating sword of the Saxons. But Britain, after its separation from the empire, ceased to attract the notice of foreign historians; and our national writers lived at so distant a period, and have interwoven so much fable in their narratives, that they possess but little claim to our confidence. From Zosimus we learn, that, on the extinction of the imperial authority in the island, the British states established domestic governments according to circumstances. These states were undoubtedly the different cities, which have been previously enumerated, and to which Honorius had directed his letters. As the colonies, municipia, and Latin towns, had always formed so many separate commonwealths under the superintendence of the provincial presidents, they would probably wish to retain the forms of government to which they had so long been habituated. It is, however, easy to conceive, that during the anarchy that must have been produced by the sudden removal of the Roman magistrates, and the confusion occasioned by the repeated incursions of the Picts and Scots, many a fortunate leader would abuse his own power and the confidence of his fellow-citizens to usurp the sovereign authority. In a few years every trace of popular government had vanished: and all the provinces which had belonged to the empire were divided among a multitude of petty chieftains, principally of British, but partly of Roman origin. They were dignified with the title of kings, though the dominions of many were confined within narrower limits than most of our present counties: and their ambition, their wars, and their vices, inflicted on the country more permanent and extensive injuries than had ever been suffered from the incursions of foreign enemies.¹

Soon after the Britons became independent, the greater part of Europe was depopulated by the two dreadful scourges of pestilence and famine. This island did not escape the general calamity: and the Scots and Picts seized the favourable moment for the renewal of their inroads. The dissensions of the native chieftains facilitated their attempts; district after district became the scene of devastation; till the approach of danger admonished the more southern Britons to provide for their own safety. Some solicited, but in vain, the protection of Ætius, the Roman general in Gaul:² others, under the guidance of Vortigern, the most powerful of the British kings, had recourse to an expedient, which, however promising it might appear in the outset, proved in the result most fatal to the liberty of their country. The emperors had long been accustomed to purchase the services of the barbarians; and the Armoricans, who, like the Britons, had thrown off the Roman yoke, had, with the assistance of the Saxons, successfully maintained their independence.³ Vortigern resolved to pursue the same policy. A Saxon squadron of three chieftains, or long ships, was cruising in the Channel in quest of adventures; and its two commanders, the brothers Hengist and Horsa, eagerly accepted the overtures of the British prince, to aid in fighting his battles, and to depend for their reward on his gratitude. They landed at Ebbsfleet, and were cantoned in the isle of Thanet.⁴

Amidst these calamities, the Britons found leisure to attend to theological disputes. About the commencement of the fifth century Pelagius a Briton, and Celestius a Scot, had advanced

¹ Gild. c. xix. xxiii. xxv.; Epist. p. 10, 12. Nen. c. lxi. Procop. Hist. Vand. l. i. p. 8, 9.

² Gild. c. xvi. xvii. xxi.

³ Sid. Apol. Paneg. Avit. v. 369.

⁴ Gild. c. xxiii. Nen. xxviii.

several new and heterodox opinions respecting the nature of original sin and divine grace. Agricola, one of their disciples, made an attempt to diffuse the new doctrine among their countrymen; and the British prelates, unaccustomed to the subtleties of controversy, solicited the assistance of their neighbours, the bishops of Gaul. With the concurrence of Pope Celestine, Germanus of Auxerre twice visited Britain, once in 429 in company with Lupus of Troyes, and again in 446 with Severus of Treves. By his authority the doctrines of Pelagius were condemned and suppressed, and schools for the education of the clergy were opened in several dioceses. On one occasion the Gallic prelate resumed a character, in which he had distinguished himself during his youth. A party of Picts and Saxons were plundering the coast. Germanus put himself at the head of the Britons, and led them to a defile, where they awaited in ambush the approach of the invaders. On a sudden, by his command, they raised a general shout of Hallelujah: the cry was reverberated from the surrounding hills; the enemy fled in amazement, and numbers perished in an adjoining river. By our ancient writers this action was celebrated under the name of the Hallelujah victory.¹

CHAPTER II.

ANGLO-SAXONS.—A.D. 449.

ORIGIN AND CHARACTER OF THE ANGLO-SAXONS—THEIR REPEATED DESCENTS IN BRITAIN—THEY FOUND EIGHT DISTINCT KINGDOMS—THE NATIVES RETIRE TO THE WESTERN COAST—REIGNS OF THE SAXON BRETWALDAS—ÆLLA—CEAWLIN—ETHELBERT—REDWALD—EDWIN—OSWALD—OSWIO.

ABOUT the middle of the second century the Saxons, an obscure tribe of barbarians, occupied the district between the Elbe and the Eyder, on the neck of the Cimbric Chersonesus:² in the course of two hundred years the same appellation had been extended to all the nations from the extremity of the peninsula to the Weser, the Ems, and the Rhine.³ They formed a kind of voluntary association, which was loosely held together by similar interests and congenial pursuits. Pillage by land, piracy by sea, were their only profession: and though the imperial fleet had often been employed to check, it could never subdue their dauntless and enterprising spirit. But as the power of Rome declined, the audacity of the Saxons increased: their expeditions became more frequent, their descents more destructive; from plunder they proceeded to colonization; and the men who had depopulated, afterwards re-peopled the better portion of Britain. Adventurers from each of the associated tribes were among the colonists; but the majority consisted of Jutes, Angles, and Saxons properly so called.⁴ The original seat of the Saxons has already been

¹ Prosp. in Chron. p. 630, ad ann. 429. Constan. Vit. S. Ger. c. 1, 28. Bed. i. 17. Hunt. 178

² Ptol. in 4^o Europe tab.

³ Eutrop. ix. p. 659.

⁴ Bed. i. 15. Ethelwerd, Chron. p. 478.

mentioned: the Angles were their neighbours on the north as far as the site of the present town of Flensburg; and beyond the Angles dwelt the nation of the Jutes, with no other boundary than the ocean.¹

From the language of these men, their lofty stature, and national institutions, it is evident that they were of Gothic descent. Their whole time was alternately devoted to indolence and to rapine. To earn by labour what might be acquired by force, they deemed unworthy the spirit of a freeman, and consigned the culture of their lands with the care of their flocks to the meaner labour of women and slaves. Every warrior attached himself to the fortunes of some favourite chieftain, whom he followed in his piratical expeditions. These chieftains guided the councils of the tribe: and from them, in times of danger, was selected a leader, who exercised the supreme command, and was dignified with the title of Cyning or king. His authority, however, was but temporary. It expired with the exigency to which it owed its existence.²

The warlike exertions of these tribes were at first checked by their want of arms: but during three centuries of intercourse or hostility with the Romans, they had learned to supply the deficiency. They bore a target on the left arm, and employed for offence the spear, the sword, and the battle-axe. The two latter were long and ponderous; and to their destructive effects is attributed the havoc which the Saxons never failed to make in the broken ranks of an enemy.³ As their ships were not fitted for the transportation of cavalry, they usually fought on foot in one compact body; but after their settlement in Britain, the chieftains, with the most wealthy of their retainers, came mounted into the field. Their esteem for the war-horse rose to a species of veneration; but previously to his initiation, his nostrils were slit, his ears were stitched up, and his sense of hearing was entirely destroyed. From that moment he became sacred to the God of War, and was conceived on important occasions to announce the will of the Deity.⁴

In the infancy of their naval power the Saxon boats resembled those of the other northern tribes; and a few planks, surmounted with works of osier, and covered with skins, bore the fearless barbarian across the ocean in the search of spoil and adventures.⁵ But in the fifth century, their chieftains or war-ships had assumed a more formidable appearance:⁶ and from the number of warriors whom they carried, and the length of the voyages which they made, we may conclude that they were formed of more solid and lasting materials. In these the Saxons repeatedly issued from their ports, sometimes steering for a particular point, sometimes trusting entirely to the guidance of the winds: but whether they were conducted by chance or design, their object was invariably the same,—to surprise and pillage the unoffending inhabitants on some part of the British or Gallic coasts. Sidonius, the eloquent bishop of Clermont, has described in animated

¹ Bede mentions also the Frisians, Boructuari or people of Berg, the Rugini, Danai, and Hunni (v. 9). Alfred, in his Orosius, distinguishes Angle-land, Sealand, and Denmark: but afterwards observes that Jutland, Sealand, and other islands were originally inhabited by the Angles. "On thām landum eardodon Engle ær hi hider on land comon."—Barrington's Orosius, p. 20. He probably used the word Engle collectively.

² Bed, v. 10. Wittich. i. p. 7.

³ Huntingd. 178, 181.

⁴ Wilk. Con. i. 160.

⁵ ——— Cui pelle salum sulcare Britannum Ludus, et assuto glaucum mare findere lembo.—Apol. Pan. Avit. v. 370.

⁶ The word is still employed on the rivers Tyne and Were. By ancient writers it is translated a long or a large ship.—See Bede, i. 15. Alfred's version, ibid. Chron. Sax. 12. Gildas, c. xxiii.

language the terrors of the provincials and the ravages of the barbarians.—“We have not,” he says, “a more cruel and more dangerous enemy than the Saxons. They overcome all who have the courage to oppose them. They surprise all who are so imprudent as not to be prepared for their attack. When they pursue they infallibly overtake: when they are pursued, their escape is certain. They despise danger: they are inured to shipwreck: they are eager to purchase booty with the peril of their lives. Tempests, which to others are so dreadful, to them are subjects of joy. The storm is their protection when they are pressed by the enemy, and a cover for their operations when they meditate an attack. Before they quit their own shores, they devote to the altars of their gods the tenth part of the principal captives; and when they are on the point of returning, the lots are cast with an affectation of equity, and the impious vow is fulfilled.”¹ The character which is thus given of them by Sidonius, is confirmed by every ancient authority. Marcellinus has recorded the terror excited by their sudden and unexpected aggressions: Zosimus allots to them the superiority in courage, strength of body, and patience of fatigue; and by the emperor Julian they are pronounced the most formidable of all the nations that dwelt beyond the Rhine, on the shores of the western ocean.²

Such was the terror of the Saxon name, when Hengist and Horsa, in 449, were invited by Vortigern to fight his battles. For six years they served him with fidelity. The Picts were taught to respect, the Britons were eager to reward, their valour. Hengist, whether he had already formed designs of conquest, or was desirous of rendering greater service to his employers, obtained permission to solicit reinforcements from his own country. The messengers, whom he sent, were received with welcome: chieftain after chieftain led his followers to Thanet; and the isle was crowded with strangers, till their number became an object of jealous apprehension to the Britons. An increased supply of provisions was demanded; and the refusal was to both parties the signal for war. The Saxons marched to the Medway, and at Aylesford were opposed by the natives. The passage of the river was fiercely disputed; Vortigern lost a son, and Hengist his brother: but the issue appears to have been favourable to the strangers. After the death of Horsa, Oisc, the son of Hengist, was associated with his father in the command, and a second battle was fought more to the west, on the banks of the Cray. It proved most disastrous to the Britons. Four of their leaders were left on the field; their troops fled with precipitation to London: and Kent was abandoned to the possession of the invaders. It was at this time that Hengist ventured, if ever he ventured, beyond the limits of that county. We are told by Gildas that the Saxons traversed the island without opposition, that they spread on every side the flames of devastation: but that on their return the natives collected in considerable numbers, and inflicted a signal vengeance on the plunderers. Some such event may perhaps have happened: but the Saxon writers are

¹ Sidon. viii. 6.

² Saxones præcæteris hostibus timentur.—Amm. Mar. xlviii. p. 526. Καρτερί γατοι θυμῷ καὶ ῥώμῃ καὶ καρτερίᾳ τῇ περὶ τὰς μάχας.—Zos. iii. p. 147. Τῶν ὑπὲρ τὴν Ῥήνον καὶ τὴν ἰσπερίαν θαλάτ-

την ἰθὺν τὰ μαχίμωτατα.—Jul. orat. i. in Laud. Const. p. 34. Angli homines omnium quos novimus barbarorum ad bella acerrimi.—Procop. Hist. Got. iv. p. 469. Gentem virtute atque agilitate terribilem.—Oros. vii. p. 549.

silent, and the hyperbolic declamation of Gildas must not be literally received. Eight years later was fought a most bloody battle, in which twelve of the British chieftains were slain; and the Saxons lost a renowned leader called Wypped, from whom the spot was named Wyppedsfleet. The last victory of Hengist was obtained in 473. The Britons are said to have fled from their enemies as "from a devouring conflagration," and to have left behind them spoils of incalculable value. The conqueror survived fifteen years, and dying in 488, left the peaceable possession of Kent to his son Oisc, from whom his successors were called Oiscingas.¹

A very different tale is told by the British writers, whose vanity has attributed the loss of Kent to the infatuation of Vortigern, and the treacherous policy of Hengist. That chieftain, if we may credit their relation, had a daughter, Rowena, of transcendent beauty. It was so contrived, that at a banquet given to the British nobles, she waited on Vortigern, who was captivated by her charms, took her to his bed, and bestowed on his father-in-law the kingdom of Kent. But his attachment to the Saxons deprived him of the affections of the Britons. His son Vortemir was placed on the throne, fought three battles with the strangers, and ultimately expelled them from Kent. During five years Hengist wandered an adventurer on the ocean: but at the death of Vortemir the father recovered his crown, and the son-in-law demanded the restoration of the possessions which he had lost. Three hundred deputies from each nation assembled in council to determine the question; but during the conference each Saxon singled out his victim: at the proper moment Hengist exclaimed, "Nemeth yure seax,—Draw your daggers:—" and the ground was covered with the dead bodies of two hundred and ninety-nine Britons. The one who had been spared, was Vortigern himself: and to free from captivity a prince whom they hated, the natives yielded to Hengist the territory which has since been divided into the counties of Kent, Essex, Sussex, and Middlesex. Can it be necessary to say that many of these pretended events are contradicted by undeniable evidence, and that all escaped the notice of Gildas, a British, and almost a contemporary, writer? The whole appears to be a fable invented by the natives, to account for the first settlement of the Saxons without the admission of conquest.²

Hengist and his successors were content with the possession of Kent. On the north, east, and south, their small domain was protected by the Thames and the sea; on the west they were removed from the hostility of the natives by the interposition of a new band of adventurers, under the command of Ælla and his three sons. In 477, these marauders landed at Cymensore, near Withering, in the isle of Selsey. The Britons made an obstinate resistance; but were defeated with considerable loss, and compelled to shelter themselves in the Andreds-wold, a forest of one hundred and twenty miles in length and thirty in breadth. The progress of Ælla was slow. In 485 he fought a great battle, the result of which is unknown: and it was not till 490 that he could penetrate as far as the city of Anderid,

¹ Chron. Sax. 13, 14. Bed. i. 15; ii. 5.

² Nen. c. 36, 44—47. I should not have noticed these fictions had it not been thought that the account of Hengist's expulsion is favoured by a passage in Gildas (aliquanto cum recessissent domum, c. 25): but it is evident that by domum he means their settlement in Kent, as he adds that the Britons attacked and defeated them there. Perhaps he may allude to the battle of Wyppedsfleet. There is a place of that name in the isle of Thanet; but it is very uncertain that it was the scene of combat.

which gave its name to the tract, and was deemed an impregnable fortress. Its fate is celebrated in our annals. While the Saxons besieged the city, they were besieged in their turn by a numerous army of Britons, who allowed them no rest either by day or night. As often as they began the assault, the natives attacked them in the rear; and if they turned on the assailants, these immediately found an asylum in the woods; from which they issued again, the moment that the Saxons moved to their former position. This harassing species of warfare suggested to the barbarian the obvious expedient of dividing his force into two armies: of which one conducted the siege, while the other watched the motions of the enemy without the walls. At last the Saxons forced their way into the place; Anderid was reduced to ashes; and every inhabitant was put to the sword.¹ This conquest secured to Ælla the possession of his former acquisitions, and he became the founder of the kingdom of Sussex, or of the South Saxons.

Five years after the destruction of Anderid, a more powerful armament of five chiules appeared in the Channel. This was under the command of Cerdic, who, sailing past the previous conquests of his countrymen, landed more to the west, at a place which, from the circumstance, received the name of Cerdicsore.² Natanleod, the king of the district, opposed the foreigners with intrepidity and perseverance; and Cerdic was repeatedly compelled to solicit the co-operation of other adventurers. In 501, Porta, with two chiules, arrived at Portsmouth, and slew a British prince who opposed his landing. Still Natanleod retarded the advance of the invaders; and in 508 he routed Cerdic, but was attacked during the pursuit by Cynric, and perished in the field with five thousand Britons. Even this important victory did not give to the Saxon quiet possession of the country. In 514 he received a great accession of strength by the arrival of his nephews Stuffa and Whitgar with three chiules at Cerdicsore: repeated victories gradually extended the conquests of the strangers; and in 519 the great battle of Charford on the Avon finally established the kingdom of Wessex, or of the West Saxons. Cerdic, having associated his son Cynric in the regal dignity, and bestowed upon his nephews the subordinate sovereignty of the Isle of Wight, died in 534.³ His was the kingdom of the West Saxons.

The success of these adventurers had given a new direction to the policy of the Saxons. Their object, which had formerly been plunder, was now converted into that of colonization. In pursuit of new settlements in a more opulent country and under a more genial sun, the most enterprising chieftains abandoned their homes, and were followed by numbers anxious to share their fortunes. There was no part of the eastern shore, from the Frith of Forth to the mouth of the Thames, which was not visited by hordes of barbarians. While Cerdic was struggling with the southern Britons, several independent chieftains had pushed their conquests along the left bank of the Thames: and in 527 Erkenwin had assumed the sovereignty of Essex, or of the East Saxons.⁴ The enterprising spirit of the Angles had led them to desert in a manner their native country.⁵ Several divisions landed to the north of the

¹ Chron. Sax. 14, 15. Hunt. 179. Sussex was computed to contain 7,000 hides of land.—Bed. iv. 13.

² Hidden tells us that this "shore of Cerdic" is Yarmouth (Gale, p. 224). He probably means Yarmouth in the Isle of Wight.

³ Chron. Sax. 15—19. Hunt. 179. Whitgar and Stuffa put to the sword every Briton in the island.—Asser, p. 5.

⁴ Mat. West. ad an. 588.

⁵ Bed. 15. Chron. Sax. 12.

East Saxons: Uffa, from whom his successors were called Uffingas, was chosen for their monarch: and so great was their power, that even while they were making conquests on the Britons, they could furnish men for a foreign expedition.¹ We are told by Procopius, a contemporary writer, that the daughter of one of their chiefs had been betrothed to Radigis, prince of the Varni, a people on the north bank of the Rhine. But on the death of his father, Radigis married his step-mother, the daughter of Theodobert the Frank, and the East Angles resolved to revenge the insult. An expedition sailed up the Rhine; the Varni were defeated; and the country was pillaged. When the victors returned to the disappointed princess, whom they had left with a sufficient guard, she loaded them with reproaches for having permitted the escape of Radigis. They returned to the pursuit, discovered the fugitive in a wood, and laid him in chains at her feet. His punishment was probably less severe than the reader will have anticipated. He was compelled to dismiss the daughter of Theodobert, and to take the East Anglian lady to his bed. The story may be substantially true, but it has undoubtedly been embellished with fiction.²

But the majority of the Angles had spread themselves more to the northward. Ida, who commanded a fleet of forty chiules, after many severe conflicts, succeeded in removing the Bernician Britons from the vicinity of the coast; and fixed his residence at Bebbanburgh, a castle which he had built on a lofty promontory, and to which he had given that name in honour of his consort Bebba.³ He obtained the regal title in 547, and reigned twelve years. His states, from their British name Bryneich, were called the kingdom of Bernicia, and were bounded on the south by the river Tyne or the Tees.

The Britons who lived on the right banks of those rivers were called Deiri, from Deyfy. The first of the Anglian chieftains, by whom they had been assailed and defeated, was Seomil. Ella, one of his descendants, in 560, obtained the undisputed possession of the country, and formed a new kingdom, which preserved its British appellation.⁴

The Angles of Deira stretched themselves as far as the Humber. In 586, a colony under the command of Creoda, passed that river, and after clearing the coast of the Britons, pushed their conquest behind the East Angles, till they had reached the very centre of the island. They were in general called Mercians, perhaps from the marshy district in which they first settled; but some of them took the name of Middle Angles from their central position.⁵

From the arrival of Hengist to the last successes of Creoda, a period had intervened of more than one hundred and fifty years. The natives had gradually retired before their enemies from the coast to the mountains, and had left about one-half of the southern division of the island in the possession of the invaders. Eight new kingdoms had been formed. Kent and Sussex were comprised within the small extent of the counties still known by those names. The East Saxons possessed Essex, Middlesex, and the south of Hertfordshire. East Anglia comprehended Norfolk, Suffolk, Cam-

¹ Hunting. 312. Bed. ii. 15.

² Procop. Hist. Goth. iv. 468.

³ Chron. Sax. p. 19. Bed. iii. 6. Nen. 63, 64.

⁴ Nen. 64. When Bernicia was afterwards united with Deira under one sovereign, the whole was called the kingdom of Northumbria, from its comprising the Saxon conquests north of the Humber.

⁵ Mercia was divided by the river Trent into north and south. North Mercia was computed to contain 7,000, South Mercia 5,000 hides, or lands of families.—Bed. iii. 24.

the lives of the Britons who fell into their hands were spared, unless the thirst of vengeance had been excited by the obstinacy of their resistance. The captives were divided, together with the land, among the conquerors: they became the property, the chattels, of their lord, subject to his caprice, and transferable at his will. The same fate attended their descendants for many generations: and from the authentic record of Doomsday it appears, that as late as the eleventh century a great part of the population of England remained in a state of serfhood.¹

The conquerors had established eight independent kingdoms in the island, though from the frequent union of Bernicia and Deira under the same head, they have generally been considered as only seven. The history of their different dynasties, were they to be arranged either collaterally or in succession, would perplex and fatigue both the writer and the reader. A sufficiently accurate notion of the period which precedes the preponderance of the West-Saxon kings may be obtained by attending to the reigns of the more powerful monarchs; for there frequently was one among the number, whose authority was acknowledged by all or by most of his contemporaries. The title by which he was designated was that of Bretwalda, the wielder or sovereign of Britain. Whether he obtained it by the influence of his power, or received it from the spontaneous suffrage of his equals, is doubtful; nor do we know whether any duties or prerogatives were attached to his dignity. By Bede the title is given to seven of the Saxon princes; other historians add an eighth. To their reigns may with propriety be referred the principal events which occurred in the kingdoms not immediately subject to their control.²

ÆLLA, BRETWALDA I.

The descent of Ælla on the southern coast, and his subsequent success, have been previously noticed. It is difficult to conjecture by what means he acquired the precedence among the confederate chieftains. The kingdom of Sussex, which he founded (477), was the smallest and the least powerful of all the new principalities. This distinction may perhaps have been conceded to some pre-eminence which he enjoyed in his native country, or to some exploit of which the memory has perished. He has scarcely obtained the notice of our ancient chroniclers.³

CEAWLIN, BRETWALDA II.

Ethelbert, the fourth king of Kent, was the first to disturb the harmony which had united the Saxon princes. At the age of sixteen, he was taught to believe that the dignity of Bretwalda belonged to him as the representative of Hengist.⁴ Under this impression he led an army against Ceawlin, king of Wessex, the grandson of Cerdic. At Wimbledon his temerity was severely chastised. Oslac and Cnebba, his two ealdormen, fell in the conflict, and Ethelbert himself escaped with difficulty from the pursuit of the enemy. Ceawlin, content with the humiliation of the king of Kent, directed his arms against the Britons. The battle of Bedford, which was fought aut tributarias genti Anglorum aut habitabiles fecit.—Bede, i. xxiv.

¹ But after the adventurers had formed and fixed permanent settlements, they gradually abandoned their former exterminating policy, and suffered the natives to retain their national institutions, and their own princes, as subordinate and tributary states. Bede gives an instance of both in Edilfrid of Northumbria, about the year 600, qui terras eorum, subjugatis aut exterminatis indigenis,

² See Bede, ii. 5, and the Saxon Chronicle, p. 71. From the strong expressions of Bede, it would not be rash to infer that the inferior kings acknowledged themselves the vassals of the Bretwalda.

³ Bed. et Chron. Sax. ibid.

⁴ Malm. p. 12. Hunt. p. 315.

under the direction of his brother Cuthwin, added to his dominions the towns of Leighton, Ailesbury, Bensington, and Eynsham: and six years afterwards the victory of Derham in Gloucestershire was marked by the fall of three British kings, Conmail, Condidan, and Farinmail, and was followed by the surrender of the important cities of Gloucester, Cirencester, and Bath. When Ceawlin had settled his new conquests, he resumed offensive operations against the Britons. At Frithern, on the left bank of the Severn, he lost his son Cutha: but victory declared for the Saxons, the neighbouring towns were plundered, and the army returned home laden with booty. A few years afterwards, on the death of Cissa, the son of Ælla, Ceawlin added Sussex to his other dominions. But fortune deserted him in the zenith of his power. His own subjects rose in arms against him; Angles and Britons hastened to assist them; and, after a bloody battle at Woodensburg, in Wiltshire, the king was driven from his throne. He died in 593, and was succeeded by his nephew Ceolric.¹

ETHELBERT, BRETWALDA III.

The disgrace which had clouded the first years of Ethelbert, king of Kent, was afterwards dispersed by the glory of a long and prosperous reign. At the death of Ceawlin he had acquired (by what means we are not informed) the dignity of Bretwalda, and his authority was admitted by all the Saxon princes south of the Humber. While he was in possession of this dignity, he received intelligence that forty strangers had landed on the isle of Thanet. These were Augustine and his associates, partly Gauls, partly Italians, whom Pope Gregory the Great had sent for the benevolent purpose of converting the pagans. Ethelbert could not be unacquainted with the Christian religion. It was probably the belief of the majority of the British slaves in his dominions: it was certainly professed by his queen Bertha, the daughter of Charibert, king of Paris. The Saxon prince received the missionaries under an oak, in an open field, at the suggestion of his priests, who had told him that in such a situation the spells of the foreign magicians would lose their influence. At the appointed time, Augustine was introduced to the king. Before him were borne a silver cross, and a banner representing the Redeemer: behind him his companions walked in procession; and the air resounded with the anthems which they sang in alternate choirs. As soon as the interpreter had explained the object and motives of their mission, Ethelbert replied, that he had no inclination to abandon the gods of his fathers for a new and uncertain worship: but that as the intention of the strangers was benevolent, and their promises were inviting, they might preach without molestation, and should be supported at his expense. This favourable answer filled them with joy; and they proceeded to Canterbury chanting as they went, the following prayer: "By thy great mercy, O Lord, turn away, we beseech thee, thy anger from this city and thy holy temple, for we are sinners. Hallelujah."²

The care of the queen had already prepared a residence for the new apostles. They were lodged in the ancient church of St. Martin, which had originally belonged to the Britons, and had lately been repaired for the use of Liudhard, a Christian prelate who accompanied Bertha from Gaul. Curiosity led the Saxons to visit the strangers; they admired the ceremonies of their worship, compared their lives with those of the pagan priests, and learned to approve a religion, which could inspire so much piety, austerity, and disinterestedness. With secret pleasure Ethelbert viewed the alteration in the sentiments of his subjects: on the feast of Pentecost, in the year 597, he professed himself a Christian, and received the sacrament of baptism; and on the following Christmas ten thousand of his subjects followed the example of their sovereign.¹

¹ Chron. Sax. 20—23. Ethelwerd, 834. Hunt. 315. In writing the name of this king, Bede (ii. 5) observes that the Angles and Saxons spoke different dialects: Cælin, qui lingua eorum Ceaulin vocabatur.

² Bed. i. 25.

The willing mind of the royal proselyte was now quickened by the letters and presents of the pontiff. He exerted all his influence to second the efforts of the missionaries; not indeed by violence (which he had learned to be repugnant to the mild spirit of the gospel), but by private exhortations, and by distinguishing the converts with marks of the royal favour. As soon as Augustine had received the episcopal consecration from the archbishop of Arles, the king retired to the city of Reculver, and gave to the missionaries Canterbury with the surrounding country. By his munificence the church of St. Saviour, originally built by the Britons, was repaired and allotted for the residence of the bishop and his clergy; while a new monastery was raised without the walls, for the use of the monks, and dedicated in honour of the apostles Peter and Paul. At the same time the number of the missionaries was augmented by the care of Gregory; and their success was rapidly extended to the boundaries of the kingdom. As each canton embraced the new doctrine, the heathen temple was converted into a Christian church; and, in order to wean the proselytes from their idolatrous practices, they were permitted, instead of the feasts which they had formerly celebrated around the altars of their gods, to assemble upon the more solemn festivals in the neighbourhood of the church, and to partake of a sober repast. To preside over the more distant converts, Augustine conferred the episcopal dignity on his disciple Justus. The new prelate fixed his residence in Rochester, in which the church of St. Andrew was erected by the piety of Ethelbert.

The kingdom of Essex was, at this period, governed by Saberct, the son of its founder, and the nephew of Ethelbert. The influence of the uncle introduced a missionary, the abbot Mellitus, to the notice of Saberct, who soon consented to receive the sacrament of baptism. The episcopal consecration was conferred on Mellitus: and London, which is represented as a populous and commercial city, was selected for the see of the new bishop. The cathedral was built and endowed at the joint expense of Ethelbert and Saberct.²

From the conversion of the Saxons the zeal of Augustine was directed to the reformation of the Britons. During one hundred and fifty years of unsuccessful warfare, the ancient discipline of their church had been nearly abolished, and the lives of their clergy were disgraced by vices the most repugnant to their profession.³ To which of the British sees the archiepiscopal jurisdiction had been originally attached, is at present unknown; but Gregory had written to Augustine, that he had subjected all the bishops of Britain to his authority. The missionary, with the aid of Ethelbert, prevailed on the British prelates to meet him at a place, which has since been called Augustine's oak, in Worcestershire. After a long and unavailing debate, the conference was ad-

¹ Bed. i. 26. Greg. Epist. vii. 30.

² Bed. i. 26, 30; iii. 8.

³ Their character has been drawn in odious

but probably too faithful colours by Gildas, a countryman and contemporary.—Gild. Ep. p. 23.

journed to another day. In the interval the Britons consulted a neighbouring hermit, who advised them to watch the conduct of Augustine; if he rose to meet them, they were to consider him as a man of unassuming disposition, and to listen to his demands; but if he kept his seat, they should condemn him of pride, and reject his authority. With this sapient admonition, which left to accident the decision of the controversy, seven bishops, with Dinot, abbot of Bangor, repaired to the place of conference. Augustine happened to be seated, and did not rise at their arrival. Both his reasons and his authority were consequently despised. In points of doctrine there had been no difference between them, and to facilitate their compliance in other matters, the archbishop had reduced his demands to three heads; that they should observe the Catholic computation of Easter, should adopt the Roman rite in the administration of baptism, and should join with the missionaries in preaching to the Saxons.¹ Each of these requests, in obedience to the advice of the hermit, was pertinaciously refused. "Know then," exclaimed the missionary with the tone of a prophet, "that if you will not assist me in pointing out to the Saxons the way of life, they, by the just judgment of God, will prove to you the ministers of death." He did not live to see the prediction verified.²

The reign of Ethelbert lasted fifty-six years. Before his death he published a code of laws to regulate the administration of justice. For this improvement he was indebted to the suggestions of the missionaries, who, though they had been accustomed to the forms and decisions of Roman jurisprudence, did not, in legislating for the Saxons, attempt to abolish the national notions of equity, but wisely retained the principle of pecuniary compensation, a principle universally prevalent in the northern nations. Those crimes which appeared the most repugnant to the well-being of society, were scrupulously enumerated; theft in its different branches, murder, sacrilege, insults offered to female chastity, and infractions of the peace of the king and of the church: and to each was attached a proportionate fine, which rose in amount according to the dignity of the person against whom the offence was committed. From these laws it appears that all freemen were classed according to their property, and the offices which they held. To each class was allotted its peculiar mund and were. The mund was the pecuniary mulct, which was intended to provide for the security of each individual, and of those under his roof. Thus the mund of a widow, if she were of the highest rank, was fifty shillings; of the second, twenty; of the third, twelve; and of the fourth, six. The were was the sum at which the life of each person was rated. If he was killed, the murderer paid it as a compensation to his family; if he himself transgressed the laws, he forfeited it, in lieu of his head, to the king. But murder was not only an offence against individuals, it was also considered as an injury to the community, and the criminal was compelled to make what was esteemed a compensation to the violated justice

¹ It is surprising that so many modern historians should have represented the Britons as holding different doctrines from those professed by the Roman missionaries, though these writers have never yet produced a single instance of such difference. Would Augustine have required the British clergy to join in the conversion of the Saxons, if they had taught doctrines which he condemned? Bede has related with great minuteness all the controversies between the two parties. They all regard points of discipline. Nowhere does the remotest hint occur of any difference respecting doctrine.

² Bed. ii. 2.

throne of the two kingdoms, returned in triumph to his dominions.¹

EDWIN, BRETWALDA V.

The martial genius of Edilfrid had raised Northumbria to an equality with the most powerful of the Anglo-Saxon states: under the government of Edwin it assumed a marked superiority, and conferred the title of Bretwalda on him and his immediate successors. The steps by which he ascended to this pre-eminence are not recorded: but the history of his conversion to Christianity has been preserved by the pen of the venerable Bede.

In the ninth year of his reign, Edwin had married Edilberga, the daughter of Ethelbert, the deceased king of Kent. The zeal of Eadbald had previously stipulated that his sister should enjoy the free exercise of her religion; and had obtained from Edwin a promise that he would himself examine the evidences of the Christian faith. The queen was accompanied by Paulinus, a Roman missionary, who had lately received the episcopal consecration. The king faithfully observed his word: but, though he made no objection to the practice of Christianity by Edilberga, he showed no inclination to embrace it himself. It was in vain that Paulinus preached; that the queen entreated; that Pope Boniface V. sent letters and presents. Edwin appeared immovably attached to the worship of his fathers.

The kingdom of Wessex was now governed by two princes, Cuichelm and Cynegils, the successors of Ceolwulf. They bore with impatience the superiority assumed by Edwin; and, unable to contend with him in the field, attempted to remove him by assassination. Eomer, in quality of an envoy from Cuichelm, demanded an audience of Edwin. He had concealed under his clothes a two-edged dagger, which had been previously dipped in poison; and while the king earnestly listened to his discourse, the assassin aimed a desperate stroke at his heart. His design did not escape the eye of the faithful Lilla, who threw himself between Edwin and the dagger, and fell dead at the feet of his master. So great was the force of the stroke, that the king was wounded through the body of his attendant. Every sword was instantly drawn: but Eomer defended himself with such desperate courage, that he killed Frodheri, another thane, before he was overpowered by numbers.

The preceding night Edilberga had been delivered of a daughter, and Edwin publicly returned thanks to the gods for his own preservation, and the health of his consort. Paulinus did not omit the opportunity of ascribing both events to the protection of Christ, whose resurrection from the grave had been that very day celebrated by the queen. His discourse made impression on the mind of the king, who permitted him to baptize his daughter, and promised to become a Christian, if he returned victorious from his meditated expedition against the perfidious king of Wessex.²

At the head of a powerful army, Edwin marched against his enemies. The two brothers were defeated; five of the West-Saxon chieftains fell in the battle; and the country was pillaged by the victors. Having satisfied his resentment, the king returned to Northumbria, and was reminded of his promise by Paulinus. From that moment he abstained from the worship of his gods, though he still hesitated to embrace Christianity. He consulted alternately his priests and the missionary, and revolved in soli-

¹ Bed. ii. 12. Chron. Sax. p. 27. Hunt. 181.

² She was baptized with eleven other female children belonging to the queen's household.—Bed. ii. 9. Chron. Sax. 27.

tude their opposite arguments. His mind was strongly influenced by the recollection of his dream in East-Anglia, and as it had been fulfilled in every other particular, he deemed it his duty to accomplish it by becoming a Christian. Having taken this resolution, he called an assembly of his witan or counsellors, and required each to state his sentiments on the subject. The first, who ventured to speak, was Coiffi, the high-priest, who, instead of opposing, advised the adoption of the foreign worship. His motive was singular. No one, he said, had served the gods more assiduously than himself, and yet few had been less fortunate. He was weary of deities who were so indifferent or so ungrateful, and would willingly try his fortune under the new religion. To this profound theologian succeeded a thane, whose discourse, while it proves the good sense of the speaker, exhibits a striking picture of national manners. He sought for information respecting the origin and destiny of man. "Often," said he, "O king, in the depth of winter, while you are feasting with your thanes, and the fire is blazing on the hearth in the midst of the hall, you have seen a bird, pelted by the storm, enter at one door, and escape at the other. During its passage it was visible, but whence it came, or whither it went, you knew not. Such to me appears the life of man. He walks the earth for a few years, but what precedes his birth, or what is to follow after his death, we cannot tell. Undoubtedly, if the new religion can unfold these important secrets, it must be worthy our attention." At the common request Paulinus was introduced, and explained the principal doctrines of Christianity. Coiffi declared himself a convert, and to prove his sincerity, offered to set fire to the neighbouring temple of Godmundingham. With the permission of Edwin, he called for a horse and arms, both of which were forbidden to the priests of the Angles. As he rode along, he was followed by crowds, who attributed his conduct to temporary insanity. To their astonishment, bidding defiance to the gods of his fathers, he struck his spear into the wall of the temple. They had expected that the fires of heaven would have avenged the sacrilege. The impunity of the apostate dissipated their alarms, and urged by his example and exhortations, they united in kindling the flames, which with the fane consumed the deities, that had been so long the objects of their terror and veneration.¹

When Gregory the Great arranged the future economy of the Anglo-Saxon church, he directed that the northern metropolitan should fix his residence at York. Edwin accordingly bestowed on Paulinus a house and possessions in that city, and was baptized in a church hastily erected for the ceremony. Pope Honorius was immediately informed of the event, and at his request granted the use of the pallium to the archbishops of Canterbury and York, with the permission, that when one of these prelates died, the survivor should consecrate his successor, without waiting to consult the Roman pontiff. To Paulinus Edwin continued to prove himself a patron and assistant, and his mansions at Yeverin in Glendale, and at Catterick in Yorkshire, were long respected by posterity, as the places where their fathers had been instructed in the doctrine of the gospel, and had received the sacrament of baptism. Nor could his zeal be satisfied with the conversion of his own subjects. At the death of Redwald, the thanes of East Anglia, who had witnessed his virtues and abilities, offered him the regal dignity. His gratitude declined it in favour of Eorpwald, the son of his benefactor, and his piety prompted him to explain to the young king the principles of Christianity. But Eorpwald was slain after a short reign of three years; and the conversion of the East Angles was reserved for the united efforts of Sigebert, his brother and successor, and of Felix, a Burgundian prelate, who received his mission from Honorius, archbishop of Canterbury.¹

¹ Bed. ii. 13.

The empire of Edwin was more extensive than that of any preceding Bretwalda. The islands of Anglesey and Man were subject to his authority;² all the princes of the Britons paid him tribute, and if, among the Saxon kings, Eadbald of Kent retained a nominal independence, he owed the benefit, not to his own power, but to the influence of his sister Edilberga. As a token of his authority, the Northumbrian assumed a distinction unknown to the Saxons, and the Tufa, a military ensign of Roman origin, was always borne before him when he appeared in public. Anxious to enforce the observance of the laws, he severely punished every act of theft or rapacity, and the advantages resulting from his inflexible administration of justice were long preserved in the recollection of posterity by a proverb, the truth of which is attested by Bede: "That in the days of Edwin a woman with a babe at her breast might have travelled over the island without suffering an insult." On the highways, at convenient intervals, he placed cisterns of stone to collect water from the nearest fountains, and attached to them cups of brass for the refreshment of passengers, an improvement which in the seventh century excited applause and gratitude.³

After the death of Ceorl of Mercia,

Penda, the son of his predecessor, possessed the power, without the title, of king.⁴ He was then advanced in age, a brave and experienced warrior, and of insatiable ambition. For some years he bore with impatience the superiority of the Northumbrian: at last he found in Ceadwalla, king of Gwynes or North Wales, an associate of equal daring and of similar views. They united their armies, unfurled the standard of rebellion, and marched into Yorkshire. The battle was fought in Hatfield Chase, between the Don and the Torre. The Northumbrian army was routed; and Edwin perished with great part of his followers. Of his sons by his first wife Quoenburga, the daughter of Ceorl, Osfrid was slain with his father, Eadfrid implored the protection of his relation Penda, and was afterwards murdered by him in violation of his oath. Edilberga with her children, and Paulinus, escaped by sea to the court of her brother in Kent.⁵

The confederates exercised without mercy the license of victory. They differed in religion; for the Britons were Christians, the Mercians idolaters: but both were equally solicitous to wreak their resentment on the vanquished, the one that they might revenge the injuries formerly inflicted on their country, the other that they might punish these apostates from the worship of their fathers. Of the two the Britons were the more savage. They spared neither age nor sex; and their cruelty, instead of being appeased by the death, exulted in the torture of their captives. Having spread devastation from one end of the country to the other, they separated. Ceadwalla remained to accomplish his boast

¹ Bed. ii. 14, 15.

² Anglesey was computed at 960 hides, Man at something more than 300.—Bede. ii. 9.

³ Bed. ii. 5, 9, 16. The Tufa is supposed by some to have been a globe, by others a tuft of feathers, fixed on a spear.

⁴ By the Saxon Chronicle (p. 28), and most other writers, he is said to have begun his reign in 626, and to have reigned thirty years: but Bede expressly says that he reigned but twenty-two, which places the first year of his reign at the period of the battle of Hatfield.

⁵ Bed. ii. 20. Chron. Sax. p. 29.

of utterly exterminating the Northumbrians; Penda marched with his Mercians into the territory of the East Angles. Sigebert their king had lately retired into a monastery, and had resigned the honours and cares of royalty to his cousin Egeric: but the East Angles were alarmed at the approaching danger, and clamorously demanded the aged monarch, who had so often led them to victory. With reluctance he left the tranquillity of his cell, to mix in the tumult of the combat. But arms were refused by the royal monk as repugnant to his profession, and he directed with a wand the operations of the army. The fortune of the Mercians prevailed; and both Sigebert and Egeric fell in the service of their country.¹

OSWALD, BRETWALDA VI.

The unfortunate death of Edwin dissolved for a short period the union of the Northumbrian kingdoms. Among the Deiri the family of Ælla retained the ascendancy; and the sceptre was placed in the hands not indeed of the children of Edwin, but of their cousin Osric, a prince mature in age, and experienced in battle. In Bernicia the memory of Ida was still cherished with gratitude, and Eanfrid, the eldest of the sons of Edilfrid, returning from his retreat in the mountains of Caledonia, ascended the throne of his ancestors. Each of these princes had formerly received baptism, Osric from Paulinus, Eanfrid from the monks of St. Columba at Icolmkill: and each with equal facility relapsed into the errors of paganism. If their ambition was satisfied with the possession of royalty, they quickly paid the price of it with their blood. Ceadwalla still continued his ravages. He was in the city of York, when Osric, hastening to surprise him, was attacked unexpectedly himself, and perished on the spot. Eanfrid, terrified by the fate of Osric and the fame of Ceadwalla, visited the Briton with only twelve attendants, solicited for peace, and was perfidiously put to death. The indignant piety of the Northumbrians expunged the names of these apostate princes from the catalogue of their kings; and the time in which they reigned was distinguished in their annals by this expressive term, "The unhappy year."²

By the deaths of Osric and Eanfrid the duty of revenging his family and country devolved on Oswald, the younger of the sons of Edilfrid (635). Impelled by despair, he sought, with a small but resolute band, the army of the Britons, and at the dawn of day discovered them negligently encamped in the neighbourhood of Hexham. Oswald had not imitated the apostasy of his brother. By his orders a cross of wood was hastily formed, and fixed in the ground; when turning to his army he exclaimed: "Soldiers, let us bend our knees, and beg of the true and living God to protect us from the insolence and ferocity of our enemies: for he knows that our cause is just, and that we fight for the salvation of our country." At his command they knelt down to pray: from prayer they rose to battle; and victory was the reward of their piety and valour. Ceadwalla was slain; and his invincible army was annihilated. By the common consent of the Bernicii and Deiri, Oswald assumed the government of the two nations. He was allied to each: for if he was descended by his father from Ida, by his mother Acha he numbered Ælla among his progenitors.³

The piety of Oswald, which ascribed his success to the interposition of Heaven, prompted him to solicit from his former teachers a supply of missionaries, who might instruct his people in the doctrines of the gospel. The first who was sent, Corman, a monk of a morose and rigid disposition, returned in disgust to his monastery: but, when in presence of the community he accused the ignorance and barbarism of the Northumbrians, he received a severe and sensible rebuke. "Brother," exclaimed a voice, "the fault was yours. You exacted from the pagans more than their weakness would bear. You should have first stooped to them, and gradually have raised their minds to the sublime truths of the gospel." At the sound every eye was fixed on the speaker, a private monk of the name of Aidan, who was chosen as the successor of Corman, by the unanimous suffrage of his brethren. Having received the episcopal consecration, he repaired to the court of Oswald, who condescended to explain in English the instructions, which the bishop delivered in his native language. Aidan received from the king the donation of the isle of Lindisfarne, since called Holy Island, in which he built a monastery, long an object of veneration to the Northumbrians. With unwearied perseverance he traversed every part of the kingdom; and his efforts were seconded by the industry of several zealous monks, who had abandoned their native country to partake in his labours. The austerity of his life, his contempt of riches, his charity to the poor, and his attachment to the duties of his profession, gained the hearts, while his arguments convinced the understanding, of his proselytes. Christianity soon became the predominant religion in Northumbria.¹

¹ Bed. ii. 20; iii. 18.

² Bed. iii. 1, 9.

³ Id. iii. 2, 6.

Oswald not only claimed that pre-eminence over the Saxons, which had been possessed by his predecessor, but also compelled the princes of the Picts and Scots to number themselves among his vassals.² Like Edwin he also contributed to add a royal proselyte to the number of Saxon Christians. At the time when Birinus, a foreign bishop, commissioned by Pope Honorius, landed on the coast of Wessex, Oswald visited that kingdom to demand the daughter of Cynegils in marriage. Their united efforts induced the monarch, his family, and principal thanes, to receive the sacrament of baptism. Even the obstinacy of Cuichelm was subdued; and on his death-bed that prince professed himself a Christian. Cynegils bestowed the city of Dorchester, near the conflux of the Tame and the Isis, on the apostle: Oswald, in quality of Bretwalda, confirmed the donation.³

But the fate of Edwin awaited Oswald, and the same prince was destined to be the minister of his death. In the eighth year of his reign, and the thirty-eighth of his age, the king of Northumbria fought with Penda and his Mercians in the field of Maser⁴ (August 5th). The pagans were victorious. Oswald, surrounded by enemies, was slain. His last words were repeated by the gratitude of the Northumbrians, and a proverb preserved them in the remembrance of their posterity. "Lord have mercy on the souls of my people," said Oswald, as he fell. The ferocity of Penda did not spare the dead body of his adversary, but severed the head and arms from the trunk, and fixed them on high poles driven into the ground. The body of Oswald was buried at Bardney, and his standard of purple and gold was suspended over the grave. The head and arms were taken down the year after his death by Oswio his successor, and

¹ Bed. iii. 3, 5.

² Id. iii. 6. By Cuminus, a contemporary Scottish monk, he is called, totius Britanniae imperator.—Cum. Vit. St. Colum. p. 44.

³ Bed. iii. 7.

⁴ By most supposed to be Oswestre in Shropshire: by some Winwich in Lancashire.

deposited, the head in the monastery of Lindisfarne, the arms in the royal city of Bamborough.¹

Bamborough was the first place that ventured to stop the destructive progress of the Mercians after the battle of Maserfield. Situated on a rock, and protected on one side by a steep ascent, on the other by the waters of the ocean, it bade defiance to their exertions. But the genius of Penda was fertile in expedients, and that which he adopted displays the ferocity of his disposition. By his order the neighbouring villages were demolished, every combustible material was collected from the ruins, and reared up against the walls, and as soon as the wind blew fiercely towards the city, fire was set to the pile. Already were the smoke and flames wafted over the heads of the trembling inhabitants, when the wind suddenly changed, and the fire spent its fury in the opposite direction. Chagrined and confounded, Penda raised the siege, and led back his army.²

OSWIO, BRETWALDA VII.

The retreat of Penda afforded leisure to the Northumbrian thanes to elect a successor to Oswald. The object of their choice was his brother Oswio, who inherited the abilities of his predecessor, and who, to strengthen his throne, married Eanfled, the daughter of Edwin.³ But the power of the nation was now broken, and his long reign of twenty-eight years, though it was occasionally distinguished by brilliant successes, was harassed at intervals by the inroads of the Mercians, the hostility of his nephew Oidilwald, and the ambition of his own son Alchfrid.

In the second year of his reign, he was alarmed by the claims of a dangerous competitor of the house of Ella, Oswin, the son of Osric, and prudence or necessity induced him to consent to a compromise, by which he allotted Deira to his rival, but reserved to himself Bernicia and the northern conquests. The character of Oswin has been drawn in the most pleasing colours by the pencil of the venerable Bede. He was affable, just, religious, and generous. His virtues were idolized by his subjects, and his court was crowded with foreign Saxons, who solicited employment in his service. Six years the two princes lived in apparent amity with each other, but in the seventh their secret jealousy broke into open hostilities. Oswin, seeing no probability of success, disbanded his army, and concealed himself, with one attendant, at Gilling, the house of the ealdorman Hundwald. The perfidious thane betrayed him to his enemy, and nothing but his death could satisfy the policy of Oswio. The bishop Aidan, who loved and revered him for his virtues, bitterly lamented his fate, and in twelve days followed him to the grave.⁴ The Northumbrian, however, did not reap the fruit of his cruelty. Oidilwald, the son of Oswald, was placed on the throne of the Deiri, probably by the superior influence of Penda.⁵

That restless monarch seemed determined to obtain the dignity of Bretwalda. He had lately expelled Coinwalch from the throne of Wessex, because that prince had repudiated his daughter Sexburga. He now directed his arms against Northumbria, penetrated again as far as Bamborough, and set fire to every habitation in the line of his march.⁶ Oswio, warned by the fate of his immediate predecessors Edwin and Oswald, made every effort to mitigate the resentment of so formidable an enemy. He sent him the most valuable presents, his second son

¹ Bed. iii. 9, 11, 12. Chron. Sax. p. 32.

² Bed. iii. 15. ³ Id. iii. 15. Nen. c. 44.

⁴ Bed. iii. 14.

⁵ Ibid. and c. 23, 24.

⁶ Id. iii. 17.

Egfrid was delivered as a hostage to the care of Cynwise, the queen of Penda, and Alchfrid, his eldest son, married Cyneburge, the daughter of the Mercian. This connection between the two families brought Peda, the son of Penda, to the Northumbrian court on a visit to his sister. There he saw and admired Alchfleda, the daughter of Oswio; but the difference of religion would have opposed an insuperable obstacle to their union, had not Alchfrid prevailed on his friend to listen to the teachers, and embrace the doctrines of Christianity. When his sincerity was questioned, he replied with warmth, that no consideration, not even the refusal of Alchfleda, should provoke him to return to the worship of Woden; and at his departure he took with him four priests to instruct his subjects, the southern Mercians, or Middle Angles, whom he governed with the title of king during the life of his father. It was to be feared that the conversion of Peda would irritate the fanaticism of Penda, but the old king, though he persevered in his attachment to the religion of his ancestors, expressed his admiration of the morality of the gospel, and permitted it to be taught to his subjects. To the converts, however, he shrewdly observed, that as they had preferred the new worship, it was but just that they should practise its precepts, and that every individual would incur his displeasure, who should unite the manners of the paganism which he had abjured, with the profession of the Christianity which he had embraced.¹

About the same time another royal proselyte was led to the waters of baptism. By gratitude, Sigebert, king of Essex, was attached to Oswio, and paid frequent visits to the court of Northumbria. Oswio laboured to convince his friend of the folly of idolatry. He frequently inculcated that images formed by the hand of the artist, could possess none of the properties of the Deity, and that the God, who deserved the worship of man, must be an almighty and eternal being, the creator, the ruler, and the disposer of the universe.² Sigebert listened attentively to his royal instructor, consulted the thanes who attended him, and was baptized by Finan, the successor of Aidan, at Waubottle, in Northumberland. The presbyter Cedd was consecrated bishop of the East Saxons, and fixed his residence in London.

But Penda had again summoned his Mercians to arms. The first victim of his resentment was Anna, king of the East Angles, who for three years had afforded an asylum to Coinwalch, king of Wessex. He fell in battle, and was succeeded by his brother Edilhere, who artfully directed the hostility of the conqueror against the Northumbrians. It was in vain that Oswio endeavoured to avert the danger by the offer of submission and tribute. The Mercian declared that it was his object to exterminate the whole nation: the presents which had been sent were distributed among his auxiliaries; and thirty vassal chieftains, Saxons and Britons, swelled with their followers the numbers of his army. Despair at last nerved the courage of Oswio. With his son Alchfrid, and a small but resolute force, he advanced to meet the multitude of the invaders. The night before the eventful contest, he fervently implored the assistance of Heaven, and vowed, if he returned victorious, to devote his infant daughter Ælfleda to the monastic profession. In the morning Oðilwald, ashamed perhaps of fighting against his countrymen, separated from the Mercians, and remained at a distance a quiet spectator of the combat. The valour or despair of the Northumbrians prevailed. Of the thirty vassal chieftains who served under the banner of the Mercian, only Oidilwald, and Catgubail, the British king of Gwynes, escaped. Penda did not survive the destruction of his army. This hoary veteran, who had reached his eightieth year, and had stained his sword with the blood of three kings of the East Angles, and of two of the Northumbrians, had been borne from the field by the crowd of the fugitives, but was overtaken by the pursuers, and put to death. The battle was fought at Winwidfield, near Leeds; and the Are, which had overflowed its banks, swept away more of the Mercians in their flight, than had fallen by the sword of the enemy. The Anglo-Saxons were accustomed to preserve by proverbs the memory of remarkable events. Of this victory it was usually said: "In Winwid's stream was revenged the death of Anna, the deaths of Sigebert and Egeric, and the deaths of Edwin and Oswald."¹

¹ Bed. iii. 21.

² Bed. iii. 22.

The fall of Penda and the annihilation of his army opened an unexpected prospect to the ambition of Oswio. With rapidity he overran East Anglia and Mercia, subdued the astonished inhabitants, and made them feel the miseries, which they had so often inflicted. Mercia he divided into two portions. The provinces on the north of the Trent he annexed to his own dominions: those on the south, out of compassion for his daughter, he permitted to remain under the government of her husband Peda. But that unfortunate prince did not long enjoy the donation. At the next festival of Easter he perished, by the treachery, it is said, of his wife; and his territory was immediately occupied by the Northumbrians.

The obligation of his vow now demanded the attention of Oswio. Ælfleda, a child not one year old, was intrusted to the care of the abbess Hilda; and her dower was fixed at one hundred and twenty hides of land in Bernicia, and at an equal number in Deira. This munificent donation enabled the sisterhood to remove from Hartlepool to a more convenient situation at Whitby, where the royal nun lived the space of fifty-nine years in the practice of the monastic duties, during one-half of which she exercised the office of abbess. The king soon afterwards endowed another monastery at Gilling. His conscience reproached him with the blood of Oswin; and at the solicitation of his queen Eanflæd, he established, on the very spot in which that prince had been slain, a community of monks, who were charged with the obligation of offering up daily prayers for the soul of the murdered king, and for that of the royal murderer.²

Oswio was now Bretwalda in the fullest sense of the word. The union of Mercia with Northumbria had placed under his control a greater extent of territory than had belonged to any of his predecessors: the princes of the Britons and Saxons unanimously submitted to his authority; and the greater part of the Picts and Scots were careful to avert his enmity by the payment of annual tribute. Yet long before his death his power suffered a considerable diminution.³ Three Mercian ealdormen, Immin, Eafha, and Eadbert, took up arms to recover the independence of their country, expelled the Northumbrian magistrates, and conferred the sceptre on a prince whom they had anxiously concealed from the researches of the Bretwalda,—Wulphere, the youngest son of Penda. In defiance of the Northumbrian he retained his autho-

¹ Bed. iii. 24. Nenn. c. 64. Alc. de Pont. apud Gale, p. 712.

² Bed. iii. 24.

³ Bed. ii. 5; iii. 24. Hence Pope Vitalian calls Britain, Oswio's island—suam insulam. —Id. iii. 29.

riety, and united under his government the Mercians, the Middle Angles, and the Lindiswaras, or natives of the county of Lincoln (656). To add to the mortification of Oswio, his eldest son Alchfrid required a portion of the Northumbrian territory with the title of king. A hint in Bede would lead us to suppose that he even drew the sword against his father. As Oidilwald had perished, the ambition of Alchfrid was gratified, and a kingdom was assigned him in the country of the Deiri.¹

From politics Oswio directed the attention of his declining years to the concerns of religion. Christianity had now been preached in all the Saxon kingdoms except Sussex: but as the missionaries had come from different countries, though they taught the same doctrine, they disagreed in several points of ecclesiastical discipline. Of these the most important regarded the canonical time for the celebration of Easter, a subject which had for several centuries disturbed the peace of the church. That it depended on the commencement of the equinoctial lunation, was universally admitted: but according to the Roman astronomers that lunation might begin as early as the fifth, according to the Alexandrian, it could not begin before the eighth, day of March. The consequence of this diversity of opinion was, that when the new moon fell on the fifth, sixth, or seventh of that month, the Latin celebrated the feast of Easter a full lunation before the Greek Christians.² In the middle of the sixth century the Roman church, weary of the disputes occasioned by these different computations, had adopted a new cycle, which agreed in every important point with the Alexandrian calculation. But this improvement was unknown to the British Christians, who at that period were wholly employed in opposing the invaders of their country; and they continued to observe the ancient cycle of Sulpicius Severus, which was now become peculiar to themselves. Hence it occasionally happened that Easter, and in consequence the other festivals of the year depending on that solemnity, were celebrated at different times by the Saxon Christians, accordingly as they had been instructed by Scottish, or by Roman and Gallic, missionaries.

Another, but subordinate subject of dispute, was the form of the ecclesiastical tonsure. A custom had long prevailed that the clergy should be distinguished by the manner in which they wore their hair; and the missionaries, not acquainted with the different modes prevailing in different countries, were at their first meeting mutually surprised and shocked at what they deemed the uncanonical appearance of each other. The Romans shaved the crown of the head, and considered the surrounding circle of hair as a figure of the wreath of thorns, which had been fixed on the temples of Christ by the cruelty of his persecutors. The Scots permitted the hair to grow on the back, but shaved in the form of a crescent the front of the head. The former pleaded in defence of their tonsure that it had descended to them from St. Peter, and accused their adversaries of wearing the distinctive mark of Simon Magus and his disciples. The latter could not disprove the assertions of their adversaries, but contended that their method of shaving the head, however impious in its origin, had been sanctioned by the virtues of those who had practised it. Each party obstinately adhered to their own custom, and severely condemned that of the other.

If such questions could divide the

¹ Bed. iii. 14; iii. 21.

² There were a few other variations in the paschal canons, which contributed still more to perplex the subject. They may be seen in Smith's Bede, App. ix. p. 698, and Dr. O'Connor, Proleg. ii. 119.

missionaries, it cannot be surprising that they should perplex their disciples. The restoration of concord was reserved for the zeal and authority of Oswio. He, with the majority of his subjects, had derived the knowledge of Christianity from the Scots, his queen Eanfled, and his son Alchfrid, had been educated by the disciples of the Romans. Thus Oswio saw his own family divided into factions, and the same solemnities celebrated at different times in his own palace. Desirous to procure uniformity, he summoned the champions of the two parties to meet at Whitby, and to discuss the merits of their respective customs. Wilfrid, afterwards bishop of York, rested the cause of the Romans on the authority of St. Peter, and the practice of the universal church, which ought not to yield to the pretensions of a few obscure congregations of Christians on the western shores of Britain. Colman boasted of the sanctity of St. Columba, the apostle of the north, and contended that nothing should be changed which he and his successors had sanctioned with their approbation. Oswio terminated the debate by declaring that he should prefer the institutions of St. Peter to those of St. Columba. The decision was applauded by the majority of the meeting; and of the Scottish monks, several conformed to the practice of their opponents, 'he others retired in silent discontent to the parent monastery in the isle of Hii.¹

In the same year, the twenty-second of Oswio, the beginning of the month of May was rendered remarkable by a total eclipse of the sun. The ignorance of the observers did not fail to predict the most alarming disasters, and the event seemed to justify their predictions. The summer was extremely dry; the heavens, to use the expression of an ancient chronicler, appeared to be on fire; and a pestilence of the most fatal description (it was called the yellow plague) depopulated the island.² It made its first appearance on the southern coasts, and gradually advancing towards the north, had ravaged before winter Deira and Bernicia. It reached Ireland in the beginning of August. The symptoms of this destructive disease have not been described by historians; but it baffled the medical skill of the natives, and many of the East Saxons, unable to account for it on natural grounds, attributed it to the anger of the gods, and reverted to their former idolatry. From the instances in Bede, it appears that many died in the course of a single day, and that of those who caught the infection, hardly more than one in thirty recovered. During twenty years it visited and revisited the different provinces of Britain and Ireland. Bede does not attempt to calculate the amount of its ravages, but is content with the vague terms of depopulated districts, and multitudes of dead. In Ireland an ancient writer computes its victims at two-thirds of the inhabitants.³ The highlands of Caledonia were alone free from this dreadful visitation. The natives piously ascribed the exemption to the intercession of their patron St. Columba, and persuaded themselves that even in the infected countries they were inaccessible to its attacks. Adamnan, the abbot of Icolmkill, relates, with obvious emotions of national pride, that twice during this period he visited the king of Northumbria, and, though he lived in the midst of the contagion, though numbers were daily dying around him, neither he, nor any of his attendants, took the infection.⁴

The pestilence no sooner appeared,

¹ Bed. iii. 25, 26.

² Compare Bede (iii. xxvii.) with the Ulster Annals. (Usher, Ant. Brit. p. 948.)

³ Vit. Geral. Sax. apud Ant. Brit. p. 1164.

⁴ Adamn. Vit. St. Columb. ii. c. xlvii. p. 153.

than it proved fatal to several of the most distinguished characters in the island. Catgualat, king of Gwynes, Ercombert of Kent, Ethelwald of Sussex, Deusdedit, archbishop of Canterbury, the bishops of London and Lindisfarne, Boisil, the celebrated abbot of Mailros, and Ethelburga, the royal abbess of Barking, were among the first of its victims. The death of the metropolitan afforded Oswio an opportunity of promoting his favourite system of religious uniformity. He consulted with Egbert, the new king of Kent, and by their concurrence, the presbyter Wighard, who had been chosen to succeed to the archiepiscopal dignity, was sent to Rome to ask the advice of the Apostolic see. But in that city the new prelate fell a victim to the pestilence which he had escaped in his own country, and his death was announced in a letter to Oswio from Pope Vitalian. The pontiff, however, assured the king that he would gratify his wishes by selecting for the church of Canterbury a person equal to so exalted a station, and after some delay Theodore, a monk of Tarsus, whose virtue and erudition had been honoured with general applause, landed in Kent, with the title of Archbishop of Britain. His authority was immediately acknowledged by all the Saxon prelates, new bishoprics were established, synods were held, and uniformity of discipline was everywhere observed.

Oswio died in 670. With him expired both the title and authority of Bretwalda. The power of Northumbria had for some years been on the decline, while the neighbouring state of Mercia, created by the genius of Penda, had gradually matured its strength, and the southern kingdom of Wessex had, with a slow but steady progress, constantly advanced in the subjugation of the Britons. These three rival nations will, in the following chapter, solicit the attention of the reader; the feeble kingdoms of Essex, Kent, East Anglia, and Sussex, sometimes the allies, but generally the vassals of their more powerful neighbours, cannot awaken sufficient interest to deserve a more detailed and separate narration.

CHAPTER III.

ANGLO-SAXONS.—A.D. 670.

KINGS OF NORTHUMBRIA—OF MERCIA—ETHELBALD—OFFA—CENULF—OF WESSEX—CÆADWALLA—INA—CYNEWULF—EGBERT—ETHELWULF—ETHELBALD—ETHEL-BERT—ETHELRED.

NORTHUMBRIA.

FROM Oswio the Northumbrian sceptre was transferred to the hands of Egfrid, the elder of his surviving sons.¹ The Picts, despising the youth of the new monarch, assembled under their prince Bernherth, and asserted their independence. But Egfrid, with a vigour which surprised and dismayed

¹ Malmesbury (20, 21) and several later writers say that Alchfrid, the elder son, was still alive, but rejected on account of illegitimacy; and that he ascended the throne after the death of Egfrid. From a diligent examination of Bede, it appears to me that they have confounded Alchfrid and Aldfrid, and made the two but one person. Aldfrid was illegitimate, and thought to be the son of Oswio. He lived in spontaneous exile them, put himself at the head of a body of horse, entered their territory, defeated them in a bloody battle, and compelled them to submit again to the superior power of the Northumbrians. With equal expedition he anticipated and defeated the designs of Wulphere, king of Mercia, who numbered among his vassals most of the southern chieftains. The victory broke for a while the power of the Mercians. Wulphere died soon after, and his kingdom was at first seized by the Northumbrian, but restored to Ethelred, who had married Osthryda, the sister of Egfrid.¹

Religious prejudice has conferred an adventitious interest on the reign of Egfrid, and his quarrel with Wilfrid, the celebrated bishop of York, occupies a distinguished but disproportionate space in our modern histories. Wilfrid was a noble Northumbrian, who had travelled for improvement, and after his return from Italy, had been selected as the instructor and confidant of Alchfrid, the son of Oswio. When Tuda died, Wilfrid was chosen to succeed him in the bishopric of York, and was sent by the two princes into Gaul to be consecrated by his friend Agilbert, bishop of Paris. Whether it was that during his absence the quarrel arose between Oswio and his son, or that the party of the Scottish missionaries had acquired the ascendancy, as is intimated by Eddius, Wilfrid, at his return, found Ceadda in possession of the episcopal dignity, and retired peacefully to his monastery at Rippon. But Theodore of Canterbury restored Wilfrid, and translated Ceadda to Lichfield. Oswio acquiesced in the decision of the metropolitan, and the bishop enjoyed for several years his friendship, and that of his successor, Egfrid.²

Egfrid's first wife was Edlithryda, the daughter of Anna, king of the East Angles, and widow of Tondberct, ealdorman of the Girvii. At an early period in life she had bound herself by a vow of virginity, which was respected by the piety or indifference of her husband. At his death she was demanded by Oswio for his son Egfrid, a youth of only fourteen years: and in spite of her remonstrances was conducted by her relations to the court of Northumbria. She persisted in her former resolution; and Egfrid, when he ascended the throne, referred the matter to the decision of Wilfrid, having previously offered him a valuable present if he could prevail on Edlithryda to renounce her early vow. The prelate, however, disappointed his hopes: the princess took the veil at Coldingham; and the friendship between Wilfrid and Egfrid was considerably impaired. The king now married Ermenburga, a princess, the violence of whose character excited the discontent of the people, and the remonstrances of the bishop. The freedom of his admonitions mortified her pride, and she found in her husband the willing minister of her vengeance.³

In the exercise of his authority Archbishop Theodore was always severe, occasionally despotic. He had already deposed three of the Saxon prelates; and Wilfrid was destined to experience the same fate. At the solicitation of Egfrid and Ermenburga, he came to Northumbria, divided the ample diocese of York into three portions; and consecrated three new prelates, one for Bernicia, a second for Deira, and among the Scots, through his desire of knowledge, and was called to the throne after the decease of the legitimate offspring of Oswio.—See Bede, p. 129, 132, 178, 206, 207, 234, 247, 293: also the poem De Abbat.

Lindis. in Act. SS. Bened. p. 305.

¹ Edd. Vit. Wilf. xix. xx. 61, 62. Bed. iv. 12.

² Edd. i.—xv. Bed. iii. 28; iv. 3; v. 19.

³ Bed. iv. 19. Edd. xxiv.

third for the Lindiswaras. But Wilfrid did not submit in silence. He complained that he had been deprived without notice or accusation: and, with the advice of his episcopal colleagues, appealed to the equity of the sovereign pontiff. The appeal was admitted. The injured prelate prosecuted it in person: Cænwald, a monk, appeared as the advocate of Theodore. After a patient hearing, Pope Agatho decided that Wilfrid should be restored to his former bishopric; but that he should select three proper persons out of his own clergy, should ordain them bishops, and divide among them the more distant parts of his diocese.¹

Egfrid and Ermenburga had made several fruitless attempts to intercept the prelate on his journey: at his return they threw him into prison, and during nine months endeavoured, by the alternate employment of lenity and rigour, of promises and threats, to extort a confession that the papal rescript had been procured by bribery, or falsified by his contrivance. Wearied at last with his constancy, and harassed by the importunities of the abbess Ebba, they consented to his enlargement, but on the condition that he should bind himself by an oath never more to set his foot within the dominions of Egfrid. Wilfrid retired into Mercia. From Mercia he was driven by the intrigues of his persecutors into Wessex; and from Wessex was compelled to seek an asylum among the pagans of Sussex. Edilwalch their king took him under his protection; and the exile repaid the benefit by diffusing among his subjects the doctrines of the gospel. The South Saxons were the last people of the octarchy who embraced Christianity.²

Though the royal families of Northumbria and Mercia were allied by marriage, their union had been broken by the ambition of Egfrid. The hostile armies met on the Trent; their valour was wasted in a dubious conflict; and peace was restored by the paternal exhortations of Theodore. Alfwín, the brother of Egfrid, had fallen in the battle; and, as the honour of the king compelled him to demand compensation, he was persuaded to accept the legal were instead of prolonging hostilities for the uncertain purpose of vengeance.³ Afterwards, in the year preceding his death, he despatched Beorht, a warlike and sanguinary chieftain, to ravage the coast of Ireland. Of the motives for this expedition we are not informed. Bede assures us that the Irish were a harmless and friendly people. To them many of the Angles had been accustomed to resort in search of knowledge, and on all occasions had been received kindly, and supported, gratuitously. Beorht requited their hospitality by ravaging their country, and burning their towns, churches, and monasteries. The natives, unable to repel the invader by force, implored on the author of their wrongs the vengeance of Heaven; and their imprecations were believed to be fulfilled in the following year by the unfortunate death of Egfrid. Against the advice of his council the king led an army into the territory of the Picts. Brude, the Pictish king, prudently retired before a superior enemy, till his pursuers had entangled themselves in the defiles of the mountains. At Drumnechtan was fought a battle, which proved most fatal to the Northumbrians: few escaped from the slaughter; Egfrid himself was found on the field by the conquerors, and honourably interred in the royal cemetery in the isle of Hii. The

¹ Edd. xxiv.—xxxi. Bed. iv. 12; v. 19.

² Edd. xxxiii.—xl. Bed. iv. 13; v. 19.

³ Edd. xxiii. Bed. iv. 21.

Picts and Scots, and some tribes of the Britons, took advantage of this opportunity to recover their independence: Trumwin, whom Egfrid had appointed bishop at Abercorn, fled with his clergy into the south; and of the Saxon settlers all, who had not the good fortune to make a precipitate escape, were put to the sword, or consigned to perpetual slavery.¹

Egfrid had left no issue by Ermenburga; and the Northumbrian thanes offered the crown to Aldfrid, the reputed but illegitimate son of Oswio. During the last reign he had retired to the western isles, and had devoted the time of his exile to study under the instruction of the Scottish monks. His proficiency obtained for him from his contemporaries the title of the learned king. Though his pacific disposition, and diminished power, did not permit him to assume the superiority which had been possessed by several of his predecessors, he reigned respected by his neighbours, beloved by his subjects, and praised by the learned whom he patronized. If he conducted in person any military expedition, it has escaped the notice of historians: but the celebrated Beorht, by his order or with his permission, attempted to obliterate the disgrace which the late defeat had brought on the Northumbrian arms; and, like the unfortunate Egfrid, lost in the attempt both his life and his army.²

In the second year of his reign, Aldfrid, at the recommendation of Archbishop Theodore, had restored Wilfrid to his bishopric and possessions. The reconciliation was not lasting. The prelates who had been expelled by the restoration of Wilfrid, acquired the confidence of the king; Brihtwald, the successor of Theodore, was induced to favour their cause; and the persecuted bishop was compelled to appeal a second time to the justice of Rome. He returned with a papal testimonial of his innocence: but Aldfrid refused to receive him, and he sheltered himself under the protection of Coenred of Mercia. Aldfrid died in 705; and in his last moments regretted his treatment of Wilfrid, and bequeathed to his successor the charge of doing justice to the injured prelate. A compromise, satisfactory to all parties, was effected in the course of the same year.³

Hitherto the actions and abilities of the Northumbrian princes have demanded a more ample space; a few pages may suffice for the history of their successors, which will present nothing to the reader but one continued scene of perfidy, treason, and murder. At the death of Aldfrid, his son Osred was eight years old. The ealdorman Eadulf usurped the sceptre, and besieged the royal infant in Bamborough: but the people espoused the cause of Osred, and the usurper, after a tumultuous reign of two months, paid the forfeit of his treason. Berctfrid assumed the guardianship of the king, and chastised the incursions of the Picts in a bloody battle fought near the wall. But Osred soon emancipated himself from the restraint of his tutor: and the ungovernable youth was slain in his nineteenth year on the banks of Winandermere, in an attempt to suppress a dangerous insurrection headed by his kinsmen, the two brothers Cænred and Osric. Cænred possessed the throne two years, Osric eleven, at whose death it descended to Ceolwulf, the brother of his predecessor. The learning and piety of Ceolwulf are attested by the venerable Bede: but he possessed neither the vigour nor the authority requisite for his station. In the second year of his reign, he was seized, shorn, and shut up in a monastery. From this confinement he escaped, re-ascended the throne, and learned amid the splendid cares of royalty to regret the tranquillity which he had reluctantly possessed in the cloister. After a reign of eight years, he voluntarily resigned the sceptre, and embraced the monastic profession at Lindisfarne.¹ He was succeeded by his cousin Eadbert, who during a reign of one-and-twenty years enlarged the territory, and revived for a while the ancient glory of the Northumbrians. The Picts and Mercians felt the superiority of his arms: and with the assistance of Ouengus, the Pictish king, he took Dunbarton from the Britons, and added Cyil to his dominions. In his old age he imitated his predecessor, and received the tonsure among the clergy of the church of York, of which his brother Egbert was the archbishop. His retreat by some writers is attributed to compulsion; others assign it to the impression made on his mind, by comparing the violent deaths of two contemporary princes with the peaceful exit of Ceolwulf.² Oswulf, the son of Eadbert, was slain by a conspiracy of his thanes soon after his accession; and the sceptre by the suffrage of the people was placed in the hands of Edinwold, a noble Northumbrian. But the descendants of Ida, who claimed it as the right of their family, considered him an usurper. The death of Oswin, his principal opponent, who fell in a battle which lasted three days in the vicinity of Melrose (Aug. 6), seemed to confirm him on the throne; but after a troublesome reign of six years, he resigned, in an assembly of the witan at Finchley, in favour of Alchred, a prince of the line of Ida.³ The inconsistency of the Northumbrian thanes was fatal to the ambition of their monarchs. Alchred, abandoned by those who had placed him on the throne, fled for protection to Kennet, king of the Picts, and was succeeded by Ethelred, the son of Edilwold, of whom we know only, that in the fifth year of his reign, his army was twice defeated by two rebel ealdormen, Ethelwald and Heardbert, and that the loss of his three principal captains induced him to fly, and leave the sceptre to Alfwold, the son of Oswulf.⁴ Alfwold's reign was as tumultuous as those of his predecessors. Beorn, his principal minister, was burned to death in Silton by a party of thanes, whose enmity he had incurred by the equity of his administration; and the king himself, whose virtue was not a match for the ferocity of his subjects, was slain by the ealdorman Sigan. The murderer, five years later, perished by his own sword.⁵ Osred, the son of Alchred, attempted to seize the crown: but the thanes recalled the exiled Ethelred, and the late claimant, to save his life, enrolled himself among the clergy of York, and afterwards for greater security fled to the Isle of Man. Ethelred returned with the thirst of revenge. He ordered Eardulf, one of his most powerful opponents, to be slain at the door of the church of Rippon. The monks carried the body into the choir. During the funeral service it was observed to breathe, proper remedies were applied to the wounds, and the future king of Northumbria was carefully concealed in the monastery. The fate of Elf and Elwin, the two sons of Alfwold, was more deplorable. They had fled to the sanctuary at York; were drawn by deceitful promises from their asylum; and paid with their lives the price of their credulity. Osred now returned from the Isle of Man, and

¹ Bed. iii. 27; iv. 26. Edd. xliii. Chron. Sax. 45. Sim. Dun. Hist. Ecc. Dun. p. 48.

² Bed. v. 24.

³ Bed. v. 19. Edd. xliii.—lviii.

¹ Mailros, 136. Sim. Dun. 100.

² Auct. Bed. p. 224. Sim. Dun. 105. Hunt. 196.

³ Sim. Dun. p. 106. Auct. Bed. 224.

⁴ Chron. Sax. 62. Sim. Dun. 107, 108. Mail. 138. ⁵ Chr. Sax. 62, 64. Mail. 139.

braved his rival to battle, but he was deserted by his followers, and added another to the victims of Ethelred's ambition. That prince, however, was hastening to the close of his bloody career. In his third year the total failure of the harvest had reduced the inhabitants to the extremity of distress; and to famine were soon added the ravages of pestilence. At that moment, to complete their misfortunes, an army of Danes landing on the coast, pillaged the country, and destroyed the venerable church of Lindisfarne, the former residence of the apostle of the Northumbrians. Both the calamities of nature, and the cruelties of this unknown enemy, were attributed to the imprudence or the bad fortune of Ethelred; and he fell in a fruitless attempt to quell the rising discontent of his subjects.¹ The sceptre stained with the blood of so many princes was next grasped by Osbald: but it dropped from his hands at the end of twenty-seven days, and Eardulf, whose life had been saved by the monks of Rippon, ascended the throne. Osbald prudently retired to the cloister, where he enjoyed a tranquillity unknown to his more successful competitor. Eardulf was compelled to fight against the murderers of Ethelred, and defeated them in a sanguinary conflict at Bilinghow, near Whalley (April 2). They found a powerful protector in Cenulf, king of Mercia. The two kings advanced against each other at the head of their respective armies: but a reconciliation was effected by the interposition of the prelates; and they swore eternal friendship to each other. Yet Eardulf was afterwards surprised by his enemies, and put into close custody. These numerous and bloody revolutions had excited the notice of foreign nations. Charlemagne pronounced the Northumbrians more perfidious than the very pagans;² and by a special messenger sought and obtained the liberation of the captive from the hands of his sanguinary subjects. There is reason to think that the opponents of Eardulf had consented to commit the decision of their quarrel to the equity of the pontiff Leo III.³ The king himself, after paying a visit to the emperor at Nimeguen, repaired to Rome, where a messenger from Eanbald, archbishop of York, had already arrived. That prelate, the ealdorman Wado, and Cenulf of Mercia, were believed by Leo to be the secret authors of the rebellion. In the beginning of 809 Eardulf left Rome, accompanied by Aldulf, the papal legate, and by the messenger of Eanbald, to whom Charlemagne, in order to manifest the interest which he took in the affair, added Rotfrid, abbot of St. Amand, and Nanther, abbot of St. Omer. With this honourable escort he arrived in Northumbria; all opposition vanished before the papal and imperial envoys; and the deposed king was unanimously restored to his throne.⁴ How long he continued to reign is uncertain.

It is unnecessary to pursue farther the history of these princes. During the last century Northumbria had exhibited successive instances of treachery and murder, to which no other country perhaps can furnish a parallel. Within the lapse of one hundred years, fourteen kings had assumed the sceptre; and yet of all these one only, if one, died in the

¹ Chron. Sax. 64, 65. Mailros, 139. Sim. Dun. 110—113.

² Gentem perfidam et perversam, pejorem paganis.—Malms. 26.

³ So I infer from the fact, that Leo was careful to preserve their letters to him even after the restoration of Eardulf, and to preserve them pro pignore.—See his letter in Bouquet, v. 604.

⁴ Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. p. 102. Annal. Bened. tom. ii. p. 883. Bouquet, Rer. Gallic. tom. v. p. 72, 255, 333, 355, 602.

peaceable possession of royalty. Seven had been slain, six had been driven from the throne by their rebellious subjects. After Eardulf, the same anarchy and perfidy prevailed, till the Danes totally extinguished the Northumbrian dynasty, by the slaughter of Ella and Osbriht in the year 867.

From these worthless princes, the votaries and victims of their ambition, the mind will turn with pleasure to two very different characters, who, in a more humble station, became the benefactors of their age and country. These were Bede and Alcuin, Northumbrian scholars, whose literary superiority was acknowledged by their contemporaries, and to whose writings and exertions Europe was principally indebted for that portion of learning which she possessed from the eighth to the eleventh century. Bede was born at Sunderland, and was intrusted in his childhood to the care of the monks of Jarrow, a convent on the right bank of the Tyne. In that seminary he spent sixty-two years, devoting, according to his assertion, the whole of his time either to his own improvement or to the improvement of others. He had studied every science which survived the ruin of the Roman empire, and if the reader look into his writings, he will be astonished at the depth and the variety of his attainments. Of his works, the most valuable is the "Ecclesiastical History of the Nation of the Angles," which while it treats professedly of the establishment of Christianity in the different Saxon kingdoms, incidentally contains almost all that we know of the history of the more early princes. This learned monk died at Jarrow in 733. His works were quickly transcribed, and dispersed among the nations of Europe, and the applause with which they were received induced the Anglo-Saxons to consider him as the ornament and pride of their nation.¹

Alcuin was a native of York, or its neighbourhood. By Archbishop Egbert he was appointed master of the great school in the archiepiscopal city. His reputation attracted crowds of students from Gaul and Germany to his lectures, and recommended him to the notice of the emperor Charlemagne. He accepted the invitation of that prince to reside in his court, diffused a taste for learning through all the provinces of the empire, and numbered the most distinguished prelates and ministers among his scholars. When, in his old age, he retired from the distractions of the palace, many followed him to his retreat at Tours, where he continued his favourite occupation of teaching till his death, in the commencement of the ninth century. His works are numerous. They consist principally of poems, elementary introductions to the different sciences, treatises on a variety of theological subjects, and an interesting correspondence with the most celebrated characters of the age.²

¹ Et rectum quidem mihi videtur, says the abbot Cuthbert, ut tota gens Anglorum in omnibus provinciis, ubicumque reperti sunt, gratias Deo referant, quia tam mirabilem virum illis in sua natione donavit.—Ep. St. Bonif. p. 124.

² The Anglo-Saxon converts were indebted for the little learning they acquired to their missionaries: and hence for some time those in the north repaired for instruction principally to Ireland, those in the south to the Roman teachers at Canterbury. This produced a kind of literary rivalry between the two islands, of which an amusing account is given by Aldhelm, who had studied first under Irish, and then under Roman masters. In his letter to Eadfrid, who had just returned from Ireland, he gives due praise to the learning of the Irish scholars; but then he observes that England too has its share, that Theodore and Adrian shine like the sun and moon at Canterbury, and that the former is surrounded with scholars even from Ireland. Theodorus summi sacerdotii gubernacula regens, Hibernensium globo discipulorum stipatur.—User, Syllog. ep. p. 38. See also O'Connor, Prol. xix.

MERCIA.

In the preceding pages the reader will have noticed the accession of Wulphere to the throne of Mercia, and his frequent and not inglorious struggles against the power of the Northumbrians. With equal spirit, and eventually with greater success, he opposed his southern rivals, the kings of Wessex. In the first conflict the chance of war made Wulphere the prisoner of Coinwalch, but with the recovery of his liberty he obliterated the disgrace of his defeat. At the battle of Pontisbury the forces of Wessex were dispersed, the victors ravaged the country of their enemies, and the Wihtwaras, the inhabitants of the Isle of Wight, submitted to the dominion of Wulphere.¹ That prince was now the most powerful of the kings on the south of the Humber; and he employed his authority in promoting the diffusion of Christianity among his dependants. Idolatry disappeared in Mercia, the natives of Essex, who, during the pestilence, had returned to the worship of Woden, were reclaimed by the preaching of the bishop Jaruman, and Edilwalch, king of Sussex, at the persuasion of Wulphere, professed himself a Christian. On the day of his baptism, he received from the munificence of his royal god-father the sovereignty of the Isle of Wight, and of the territory of the Meanwaras, a district comprehending almost the eastern moiety of Hampshire. Wilfrid, who had been driven into exile by the resentment of Ermenburga, improved the opportunity to establish the belief of the Gospel in the kingdom of Sussex, and Edilwalch rewarded his zeal with the donation of the Isle of Selsey, containing eighty-seven hides of land, and two hundred and fifty slaves. They were baptized, and immediately received their freedom from the piety of the bishop.²

The power of Wulphere declined as rapidly as it had risen. Towards the end of his reign, he was defeated by the Northumbrians, and lost the province of the Lindiswaras. The men of Wessex, who had borne his superiority with impatience, were encouraged by the victory of the Northumbrians to try again the fortune of war. Though the battle was not decisive, it contributed to break the power of Wulphere, at whose death, Egfrid, the Northumbrian monarch, overran and subjected the kingdom.³

Ethelred was the brother of Wulphere, and had married Osthyrda, the sister of Egfrid. To this alliance he was perhaps indebted for the crown of Mercia. He led an army against Lothaire, king of Kent, burnt the villages and churches, carried off the inhabitants, and destroyed the city of Rochester. He next demanded the province of the Lindiswaras from Egfrid; a war ensued; Ælfwin, the brother of the Northumbrian, was slain, and Ethelred, though he paid the were for the death of Ælfwin, recovered the possession of the disputed territory. For many years he reigned with honour, but the murder of his queen Osthyrda by the Suthenhymbre, the people between the Trent and the Humber, deeply affected his mind. He gave the government of the discontented district to his nephew Cœnred, the son of Wulphere, and at last abdicated the throne in his favour. He had children of his own, but they were of an immature age, and the nation preferred a successor of approved judgment and in the vigour of manhood. Ethelred then took the monastic vows in the monastery of

¹ This appears the most plausible manner of reconciling Ethelwerd (p. 476) with the Saxon Chronicle (p. 39) and Bede (iv. 13).

² Bed. iii. 30; iv. 13. Edd. Vit. Wilf. xl.

³ Chron. Sax. p. 41. Edd. xx.

Bardeney, was raised to the office of abbot, and died at an advanced age in 716.¹

Cœnred was a prince whose piety and love of peace are loudly applauded by our ancient chroniclers, but whose short reign of five years affords only a barren theme to the historian. As soon as Ceolred, the son of the preceding monarch, was of an age to wield the sceptre, Cœnred resigned the crown, and travelling to Rome, received the monastic habit from the hands of Pope Constantine. Offa, the son of Sighere, king of Essex, was the companion of his pilgrimage, and the imitator of his virtues.²

The reign of Ceolred was almost as tranquil as that of his predecessor. Once only had he recourse to the fortune of arms, against Ina, king of Wessex. The battle was fought at Wodensbury, and the victory was claimed by each nation. But Ceolred degenerated from the piety of his fathers, and by the licentiousness of his morals alienated the minds of the Mercians. In the eighth year of his reign, as he sat at table with his thanes, he suddenly lost his reason, and shortly after expired in the most excruciating torment.³

Contemporary with Ceolred was Ethelbald, a descendant of Alwin, the brother of Penda. He was in the vigour of youth, graceful in his person, ambitious of power, and immoderate in his pleasures. To avoid the jealousy of Ceolred, by whom he was considered a rival, Ethelbald had concealed himself among the marshes of Croyland, where he was hospitably entertained by Guthlake, a celebrated hermit. As soon as he had learned the death of his persecutor, he issued from his retreat, assumed the sceptre without opposition, and afterwards, to testify his gratitude for his former benefactor, raised a magnificent church and monastery over the tomb of Guthlake.⁴ The character of Ethelbald was a compound of vice and virtue. He was liberal to the poor and to his dependants, he watched with solicitude over the administration of justice, and he severely repressed the hereditary feuds, which divided the Mercian thanes, and impaired the strength of the nation. Yet in his own favour he never scrupled to invade the rights of his subjects, and that no restraint might be imposed upon his pleasures, he refused to shackle himself with the obligations of marriage. The noblest families were disgraced, the sanctity of the cloister was profaned by his amours. The report of his immorality reached the ears of the missionary St. Boniface, who from the heart of Germany wrote to him a letter of most earnest expostulation.⁵ What influence it had on his conduct, is not mentioned, but he soon afterwards attended a synod, held by Archbishop Cuthbert for the reformation of manners, and long before his death forsook the follies and vices of his youth.

Of the kings who had hitherto swayed the Mercian sceptre, Ethelbald was the most powerful. From the Humber to the southern channel, he compelled every tribe to obey his authority: but he seems to have respected the power or the abilities of the Northumbrian monarchs: and, if he ventured twice to invade their territories, it was at times when they were engaged in the north against the Picts, and when the spoils which he obtained were dearly purchased by

¹ Bed. iv. 12, 21; v. 19. Chron. Sax. 44, 46. Flor. ad ann. 716. Chron. Pet. de Burg. p. 8.

² Bed. v. 19.

³ Chron. Sax. p. 50, 51. Ep. St. Bonif. apud Spelm. p. 226.

⁴ Ingul. p. 2. To construct the building, Ethelbald gave 300 pounds of silver the first year, and 100 pounds a year for the ten following years (p. 3).

⁵ Ep. St. Bonif. apud Spelm. p. 226.

the infamy of the aggression.¹ In the south the kings of Wessex struggled with impatience against his ascendancy, but every effort appeared only to rivet their chains. They were compelled to serve him as vassals, and to fight the battles of their lord. At length, in 752, Cuthred undertook to emancipate himself and his country, and boldly opposed the Mercians in the field of Burford in Oxfordshire. In the open space between the two armies, Edilhun, who bore the golden dragon, the banner of Wessex, slew with his own hand the standard-bearer of Ethelbald: and his countrymen hailed as the omen of victory the valour of their champion. An ancient poet has described in striking language the shock of the two armies; the shouts and efforts of the combatants, their murderous weapons, the spear, the long sword, and the battle-axe, and their prodigality of life in the defence of their respective standards. Chance at length conducted Ethelbald to the advance of Edilhun: but the king of Mercia shrunk before the gigantic stature and bloody brand of his adversary, and gave to his followers the example of a precipitate flight. This defeat abolished for a time the superiority of Mercia.²

Ethelbald did not long survive his disgrace. Beornred, a noble Mercian, aspired to the throne, and a battle was fought on the hill of Seggeswold in Warwickshire. The king either fell in the engagement, or was killed by his own guards on the following night. His body was buried in the monastery of Repandune.³

The death of Ethelbald transferred the momentary possession of the crown to Beornred; but the thanes espoused the interests of Offa, a prince of royal descent; and the usurper, at the end of a few months, was defeated in battle, and driven out of Mercia. Of the reign of the new monarch the first fourteen years were employed in the subjugation of his domestic enemies, and the consolidation of his own power, objects which he was unable to effect without the effusion of much blood.⁴ In 771 he first appeared in the character of a conqueror, and subdued the Hestingi, a people inhabiting the coast of Sussex.⁵ Three years afterwards he invaded Kent, routed the natives at Otford, and stained the waters of the Darent with the blood of the fugitives.⁶ From the more feeble, he turned his arms against the more powerful states. He entered Oxfordshire, which then belonged to Wessex; Cynewulf, the West Saxon monarch, fled before him; Bensington, a royal residence, was taken; and the territory on the left bank of the Thames became the reward of the conqueror.⁷ The Britons were next the victims of his ambition. The kings of Powis were driven from Shrewsbury beyond the Wye; the country between that river and the Severn was planted with colonies of Saxons; and a trench and rampart, stretching over a space of one hundred miles from the mouth of the Wye to the estuary of the Dee, separated the subjects of Offa from the incursions of their vindictive neighbours.⁸ The Northumbrians

¹ Bed. v. 23. In his charters he calls himself Rex Britannie, and Rex non solum Merciorum sed et omnium provinciarum, quæ generali nomine Sutangi dicuntur.—Smith's Bed. app. p. 786. Hunt. 195. Chron. Sax. 54. ² Hunt. 195. West. ad ann. 755.

³ Ingl. p. 5. Auct. Bed. p. 224. Sim. Dun. p. 105. Malm. f. 14.

⁴ Ep. Alcuini apud Malm. p. 33. Lell. Collect. i. 402.

⁵ Mail. p. 138. Sim. Dun. p. 107. The Hestingi have been sought in every part of the island. A charter in Dublet fixes them in Sussex. By it Offa confirms a grant of land in the neighbourhood of Hastings to the abbey of St. Denis, and styles Bertwald, the proprietor of Hastings and Pevensay, his fidelis.—Apud Alford, ad ann. 790.

⁶ Chron. Sax. 61. Mail. 138.

⁷ Chron. Sax. 61. Mail. 138. Ethel. 477.

⁸ Wise's Asser. p. 10. Sim. Dun. p. 118. Caradoc. p. 20. Langhorn. p. 292.

also, but in what year is uncertain, were compelled to own the superiority of the Mercian.¹

The chair of St. Peter was filled at this period by Adrian, the friend and favourite of Charlemagne. In 785 two papal legates, the bishops of Ostia and Tudertum, accompanied by an envoy from the French monarch, landed in England, and convoked two synods, the one in Northumbria, the other in Mercia. In the latter, which was attended by Offa, and by all the princes and prelates on the south of the Humber, the legates read a code of ecclesiastical laws composed by the pontiff for the reformation of the Anglo-Saxon church. It was heard with respect, and subscribed by all the members.² The ambition of Offa did not omit the opportunity of attempting a project, which he had long meditated. Jaenbercht, archbishop of Canterbury, had formerly offended the king, and had been deprived by him of all the manors which belonged to his see in the Mercian territories. From the man, the enmity of Offa was transferred to the church over which he presided. Why, the king asked, should the Mercian prelates be subjected to the jurisdiction of a Kentish bishop? Why should the most powerful of the Saxon kingdoms be without a national metropolitan? According to his wishes a proposition was made in the synod, that the jurisdiction of the see of Canterbury should be confined to the three kingdoms of Kent, Sussex, and Wessex; that one of the Mercian bishops should be raised to the archiepiscopal rank; and that all the prelates between the Thames and the Humber should be subject to his authority. Jaenbercht did not acquiesce without a struggle in the degradation of his church; but the influence of Offa was irresistible; and Higebert of Lichfield was selected to be the new metropolitan.³ Still it was necessary to procure the papal approbation. The messengers of Offa urged the great extent of the province of Canterbury, and the propriety of appointing a native metropolitan to preside over the churches of so powerful a kingdom as Mercia: the advocates of Jaenbercht alleged the letters of former pontiffs, the prescription of two centuries, and the injustice of depriving an innocent prelate of more than one-half of his jurisdiction. Adrian assented to the wishes of the king: the pallium with the archiepiscopal dignity was conferred upon Adulph, the successor of Higebert in the see of Lichfield; and Jaenbercht was compelled to content himself with the obedience of the bishops of Rochester, London, Selsey, Winchester, and Sherburne.⁴

Before the conclusion of the council, Egferth, the son of Offa, was solemnly crowned, and from that period reigned conjointly with his father. At the same time the king delivered into the hands of the legates a charter, in which he bound himself by oath, and promised for his successors, to send annually the sum of three hundred and sixty-five mancuses to the church of St. Peter, in Rome, to be employed partly in defraying the expenses of the public worship, partly in the support of indigent pilgrims.⁵

Alcuin, the Anglo-Saxon preceptor

¹ West. 142. Offa, in a charter, dated 780, styles himself Rex Merciorum simulque aliarum circumquaque nationum.—Smith, Bed. app. p. 767.

² Chron. Sax. 64. Wilk. Con. tom. i. p. 151.

³ Malm. f. 15. Wilk. Con. p. 152, 164. It was, says the Saxon Chronicle, a "gefitfullic (quarrelsome) synod" (p. 63). The situation of Calceuth or Calcythe, where it was held, is disputed. I suspect it to be Chelsey, which was called Chelceothe as late as the end of the fifteenth century.—Lel. Col. iv. 250.

⁴ Ang. Sax. i. 480. Malm. f. 15. Spel. Con. 302.

⁵ Ang. Sax. i. 461. Chron. Sax. p. 64. Huntingdon (f. 197) says, Egferth was crowned king of Kent; but in this he differs from all other historians. The mancuse was equal to thirty pennies.

of Charlemagne, had been instrumental in opening an epistolary correspondence between his royal pupil and the king of Mercia.¹ From the letters, which are still extant, it appears that several of the thanes, who had opposed the succession of Offa, finding it unsafe to remain in England, had sought an asylum upon the continent. The humanity of Charlemagne refused to abandon them to the resentment of their enemy. Those who asserted their innocence, he sent to Rome to exculpate themselves before the pope: the others he retained under his protection, not, as he said, to encourage them in their rebellion, but with the hope that time might soften the resentment of Offa, and that the fugitives might be received into favour. Once he intrusted some of them to the faith of Ethelheard, the successor of Jaenbercht in the see of Canterbury: but on the express condition that he should send them back to France in safety, unless Offa should give the most solemn assurances that he would pardon their offences.² Another subject of discussion regarded the mercantile interests of the two nations. It was complained that the avarice of the English manufacturers had induced them to contract the size of the woollen gowns, which they exported to the continent; and the vigilance of the French had detected several adventurers, who, under the disguise of pilgrims, had attempted to impose on the officers of the customs.³ These points were amicably arranged; but a new occurrence interrupted for a time that harmony, which had subsisted for so many years. Charlemagne, as a proof of his friendship, had proposed a marriage between his illegitimate son Charles and a daughter of Offa. The Mercian, as the price of his consent, demanded a French princess for his son Egferth. If we reflect that the two monarchs had hitherto treated each other on the footing of perfect equality, there will not appear anything peculiarly offensive in such a demand. Yet it wounded the pride of Charlemagne; he broke off all communication with the Mercian court; and the trade with the English merchants experienced the most rigorous prohibitions. But Gerwold, the collector of the customs, whose interests probably suffered from this interruption of commerce, contrived to pacify his sovereign; and Alcuin, who was commissioned to negotiate with the Mercian, succeeded in restoring the relations of amity between the two courts.⁴

The most powerful of the Saxon princes were ambitious of an alliance with the family of Offa. Brihtric and Ethelred, the kings of Wessex and Northumbria, had already married his daughters Eadburga and Ellfeda; and Ethelbert, the young king of the East Angles, was a suitor for the hand of their sister, Etheldrida. This amiable and accomplished prince (so

¹ In his letters Charles gives himself the sounding title of "the most powerful of the Christian kings of the east;" and at the same time, to soothe the vanity of Offa, calls him "the most powerful of the Christian kings of the west."—Ep. Car. Mag. apud Bouquet, tom. v. p. 620.

² The letter to Ethelheard is so honourable to Charlemagne, that I shall offer no apology for transcribing a part of it. Hos miseros patrum suæ exules vestræ direximus pietati, deprecantes, ut pro ipsis intercedere dignemini apud fratrem meum carissimum Offanum regem.—His si pacem precari valeatis, remaneant in patria. Sin vero durius de illis frater meus respondeat, illos ad nos remittite illasos. Melius est enim peregrinare quam perire, in aliena servire patria quam in sua mori. Confido de bonitate fratris mei, si obnixæ pro illis intercedatis, ut benigne suscipiat eos, pro nostro amore, vel magis pro Christi charitate, qui dixit, Remittite et remittetur vobis.—Int. Epist. Alcuini, ep. 61.

³ Malms. f. 17. Lel. Collec. i. 402. Wilk. Con. i. 158. Bouquet, v. 627.

⁴ Chron. Fontanellen. c. xv. apud Bouquet, v. 315. Epist. Alc. ad Colo. ibid. p. 607.

he is described) by the advice of his council proceeded with a numerous train to Mercia. On the confines he halted, and sent forward a messenger with presents and a letter, announcing the object of his intended visit. A kind invitation was returned, accompanied with a promise of security. At his arrival he was received with the attention becoming his dignity, and expressions of affection most flattering to his hopes. The day was spent in feasting and merriment: in the evening Ethelbert retired to his apartment: but shortly afterwards was invited by Wimbert, an officer of the palace, to visit Offa, who wished to confer with him on matters of importance. The unsuspecting prince, as he followed his guide through a dark passage, was surrounded by ruffians, and deprived of life. At the news, his attendants mounted their horses and fled: Etheldrida, disappointed in her expectations of worldly happiness, retired from court, and lived a recluse in the abbey of Croyland: and Offa, shut up in his closet, affected, by external demonstrations of grief, to persuade the world of his innocence. Gratitude to the founder of his abbey has induced the monk of St. Albans to transfer the whole guilt from the king to his consort Cyne-drida: by every other ancient writer, though she is said to have suggested, he is represented as having sanctioned the foul deed; and, if it be true that he immediately annexed East Anglia to his own dominions, little doubt can be entertained that the man, who reaped the advantage, had directed the execution of the murder.¹

¹ Westminster is merely the copyist of the monk of St. Albans, who, besides confining the guilt to the queen, makes Ethelbert sink through a trap-door into a cave, where he was despatched.—V^{it}. Off. ii. p. 980. Wallingford (p. 530), on some ancient authority, describes him as falling in battle. Occidit in campestri indicto bello.—See Chron. Sax. 65. Malm. 15. Ethelw. 477. Asser, Ann. 154. Brompton, 749—752.

Offa honoured the memory of the prince, whose blood he had shed, by erecting a stately tomb over his remains, and bestowing rich donations on the church of Hereford, in which they reposed. About the same time he endowed the magnificent abbey of St. Albans. But his heart was corroded by remorse, and his body enfeebled by disease. Within two years he followed Ethelbert to the grave (Aug. 10), and was buried near Bedford, in a chapel on the banks of the Ouse. It was a tradition of the neighbourhood, that, a few years afterwards, the river overflowed, and that his bones were carried away by the inundation.²

Egferth, who had been crowned nine years before, succeeded his father. The ancient writers indulge in reflections on the misfortunes of a family, the establishment of which had cost its founder so many crimes. Egferth died without issue after he had possessed the crown one hundred and forty-one days. Of his sisters, Elfleda became a widow soon after her marriage; Eadburga died in poverty and exile in Italy; and Edilthrida finished her days in seclusion at Croyland. Within a few years after the murder of Ethelbert, Offa and his race had disappeared for ever.³

The throne of Mercia was next filled by Cenulf, descended from another of the brothers of Penda. At the commencement of his reign, a singular revolution in Kent directed his attention to that kingdom. By the death of Aluric the race of Hengist became extinct, and the prospect of a throne awakened the ambition of ² I have not mentioned Offa's pretended journey to Rome; for it could not have escaped the notice of every historian before the fabulous monk of St. Albans. The institution of the Romescot is attributed to him by Huntingdon: I suspect that writer has confounded it with the annual donation of 365 mancuses already mentioned.

³ Ing. p. 6.

several competitors. The successful candidate was a clergyman related to the descendants of Cerdic, Eadbert Pren, whose aspiring mind preferred the crown to the tonsure.¹ Ethelheard, the archbishop of Canterbury, beheld with sorrow his elevation, but if he treated Eadbert as an apostate, Eadbert considered him as a rebel, and the metropolitan, unable to maintain the discipline of the canons, consulted the Roman pontiff, Leo III., who after mature deliberation, excommunicated the king, and threatened, that, if he did not return to the clerical profession, he would exhort all the inhabitants of Britain to unite in punishing his disobedience.² Cenulf took this office on himself, and Eadbert, convinced that resistance would be vain, endeavoured to elude the vigilance and revenge of his enemies. He was, however, taken: the eyes of the captive were put out, and both his hands amputated. Cuthred, a creature of the victor's, obtained the throne, with the title, but without the authority, of king; and Eadbert was reserved by the Mercian for the gratification of his vanity. A day had been appointed for the dedication of the church of Winchelcomb, which he had built with royal magnificence. The ceremony was attended by two kings, thirteen bishops, ten ealdormen, and an immense concourse of people, and in their presence Cenulf led his mutilated captive to the altar, and of his special grace and clemency granted him in the most solemn manner his freedom. According to the national custom, the parade of the day was concluded with the distribution of presents. To the kings, prelates, and ealdormen he gave horses, garments of silk, and vases of the precious metals; to each visitor of noble birth, but without landed possessions, a pound of silver; and to every monk and clergyman a smaller but proportionate sum.³

The next undertaking of Cenulf was an act of justice,—to restore to the successors of St. Augustin the prerogatives of which they had been despoiled at the imperious demand of Offa. The authority of the new metropolitan had been endured with reluctance by the English prelates, his former equals; and the archbishops of Canterbury and York seized the first opportunity of conveying to the king the sentiments of the episcopal body. He acquiesced in their wishes; a letter in his name and that of the nobility and clergy was written to Leo III., and Ethelheard proceeded to Rome to plead in person the rights of his church. A favourable answer was obtained, and Ethelheard, at his return, summoned a council of twelve bishops, in which it was declared that the decree of Pope Adrian had been surreptitiously obtained, and the metropolitan of Lichfield was reduced to his former station among the suffragans of Canterbury.⁴

Archbishop Wulfrid was, like his predecessor, for some time the favourite of Cenulf.⁵ With the origin of the subsequent dissension between them, we are unacquainted: but we find the king displaying the most violent hostility against the primate, and excluding him during six years from the exercise of the archiepiscopal authority. Both appealed to the Holy See, and Wulfrid repaired to Rome, to vindicate his character from the

¹ Hunting. f. 197. Wallingford says that he was brother to Ethelred, the eldest son of Withred (p. 530).

² Anglia Sacra, i. 460. In the pope's letter the name of the king is not mentioned; but all circumstances conspire to point out Eadbert.

³ Monast. Angl. i. 189. Chron. Sax. 67. Sim. Dun. 114. Malm. 13. Walling. 530.

⁴ Wilk. Con. 163, 167. Smith's Bed. app. p. 787. Malm. f. 15. Evid. Eccl. Christ. 2212.

⁵ Ing. p. 6.

charges of his royal persecutor. At his return, Cenulf summoned him before a great council in London. "I require," said the king, "that you surrender to me and my heirs your manor of three hundred hides at Yongesham, and pay to me one hundred and twenty pounds of silver. If you refuse, I will drive you out of Britain, and no solicitation of the emperor, no command of the pope, shall ever procure your return." Wulfrid heard the menaces with firmness; and Cenulf showed himself inflexible. After much altercation and many remonstrances, a compromise was effected by the interposition of the nobility and clergy. Wulfrid acquiesced in the king's demand: and Cenulf consented that the cession should be of no value, unless he wrote to the pope in favour of the archbishop, and restored him to all the privileges which his predecessors had enjoyed. But no sooner had he obtained possession of the manor and the money, than he laughed at the credulity of Wulfrid, who was compelled to submit in silence, and to wait for compensation from the justice of Cenulf's successor.¹

After a prosperous reign of twenty-six years, the king was killed in an expedition against the East Anglians. Notwithstanding his persecution of the archbishop, he is celebrated by our ancient writers for his piety no less than his courage and good fortune. He was succeeded by his only son Kenelm, a boy of seven years of age. After the lapse of a few months, the young prince accompanied his tutor Ascebert into a forest, where he was barbarously murdered. Suspicion attributed his death to his elder sister Quendrida, whose ambition, it was said, would have willingly purchased the crown with the blood of a brother. If such were her views, she was disappointed. Ceolwulf, her uncle, ascended the throne; but Quendrida succeeded to the patrimony of her father, and is frequently mentioned in the English councils with the titles of abbess, and heiress of Cenulf.²

The reign of Ceolwulf was short. In his second year he was dethroned by Beornwulf, a Mercian, who had no better title than his power and opulence. He obliged Quendrida to compound with Wulfrid for the land which her father had wrested from the archbishop. His abilities are said to have been unequal to his station, and he was soon compelled to yield to the superior genius of Egbert, king of Wessex.³

WESSEX.

From the kings of Mercia it is time to return to the descendants of Cerdic, whose fortune or abilities, after a struggle of three hundred years, triumphed over every opponent, and united all the nations of the Anglo-Saxons in one great and powerful monarchy. The death of the bretwalda Ceawlin and the accession of his nephew Ceolric, have been already noticed. To Ceolric, after a short reign of five years, succeeded his brother Ceolwulf, whose enterprising spirit engaged him in constant hostilities with the Saxons, Britons, Scots, and Picts.⁴ The men of Sussex made a bold but unsuccessful effort to recover their independence. The war was conducted with the most obstinate valour; and though Ceolwulf crushed his opponents, it was with the loss of his bravest warriors.⁵ He next led a numerous army against the Britons, drove Mouric, their king, beyond the Severn, and penetrated to ¹ Wilk. Con. 172, 173. Spel. Con. 332. Chron. Sax. 69.

² Ing. p. 7. Wilk. and Spel. ibid. Probably she was called abbess because Cenulf had left her the abbey of Winchelcomb.

³ Ing. p. 7.

⁴ Chron. Sax. p. 23. Hunt. 181.

⁵ Ibid. p. 25. Hunt. 181.

the banks of the Wye. The pride of the natives attributed their reverses not to the superiority of the conquerors, but to the incapacity of their leader. His father Tewdric, it was said, had never shown his back to an enemy: were he to place himself at their head, the Saxons would not dare to appear in his presence. Tewdric had resigned the sceptre, and led the life of a hermit amidst the rocks of Dindyrn. From his cell he was drawn by the entreaties of his countrymen; and assumed with reluctance the command of the army. In the battle which followed, the hermit gained the victory, but lost his life. He received a wound in the head, of which he died near the confluence of the Wye and the Severn. Ceolwulf did not survive him more than a year.¹

Ceolwulf was succeeded by Cynegils, the son of Ceolric, who divided the kingdom with his brother Cuichelm. This partition did not diminish the strength of the nation. The two brothers appeared to be animated by the same spirit, and united their efforts to promote the public prosperity. They led a powerful army to Bampton, in Devonshire. The Britons fled at the martial appearance of the enemy; and the Saxons returning from the pursuit numbered two thousand and forty-six enemies among the slain.² The three sons of Saberct, who had succeeded to the kingdom of Essex, ventured to provoke the hostility of the two brothers; but they fell on the field of battle, and of their followers but few escaped to carry the intelligence to their countrymen.³

The character of Cuichelm is disgraced by the attempt of his messenger Eomer to assassinate Edwin, king of Northumbria. What peculiar provocation he might have received, it is in vain to conjecture: according to Malmesbury, he had been deprived of part of his territory. The silence of historians acquits Cynegils of any share in the guilt of his brother; but he was unwilling to see him fall a victim to the resentment of the Northumbrian, and assisted him with all his forces in a fruitless attempt to repel Edwin. Fortunately the conqueror was appeased, and left them in possession of their territories.⁴

Two years afterwards, Penda, who was then beginning his sanguinary career, determined to measure his strength with that of the West Saxons. The obstinacy of the two armies prolonged the contest till it was interrupted by the darkness of night. The conflict was about to be renewed in the morning, when both parties, appalled by the loss of the preceding day, were induced by their mutual fears to listen to terms of reconciliation. The battle was fought at Cirencester.⁵ Both Cynegils and Cuichelm received baptism from the hands of the bishop Birinus. Cynegils survived his brother seven years, and died in 642.

The throne was next filled by Coinwalch, the son of the last monarch, who had refused to embrace Christianity with his father and uncle. He had formerly married a sister of Penda; but as soon as he obtained the crown, he dismissed her with ignominy, and bestowed his hand on a more favourite princess. The Mercian, urged by resentment, entered Wessex, defeated Coinwalch, and chased him out of his dominions.

¹ Usher de Prim. p. 292. Langhorn, p. 148. As Tewdric was killed by pagans, the Britons styled him a martyr. Mathern, where he was buried, derived its name from the words Merthir Tewdric. When Bishop Godwin repaired his tomb, he found the bones entire, and the fracture of the skull apparently recent.—God. de Præsul. p. 593.

² Hunt. 181. Malm. 6. Chron. Sax. p. 25.

³ Hunt. 181.

⁴ Bed. ii. 9. Chron. Sax. 27, 28.

⁵ Chron. Sax. p. 29. Ethelward, 476. Hunt. 181.

He found an asylum in the territory of Anna, the virtuous king of the East Angles, where he was induced to abjure the deities of paganism. In the third year of his exile, he recovered his throne by the assistance of his nephew Cuthred; and as a testimony of his gratitude, bestowed on his benefactor three thousand hides of land, at Aston, in Berkshire. His next care was to fulfil the pious bequest of his father, and to erect a church and monastery in the city of Winchester. Its size and magnificence astonished his countrymen.¹

Coinwalch was eminently successful against the Britons. He defeated them at Bradford, and afterwards at Pen, and made the Parret the western boundary of his kingdom. But he was compelled to bend before the superior power of Wulphere, king of Mercia. If the chance of war threw that prince into the hands of Coinwalch, the reader has seen that he recovered his liberty, defeated the West Saxons, and transferred the sovereignty of the Isle of Wight, and of part of Hampshire, to his friend Edilwalch, the king of Sussex.²

At the death of Coinwalch without children, an alluring prospect was opened to the ambition of the remaining descendants of Cerdic, but the reins of government were instantly seized by his widow Sexburga, a princess whose spirit and abilities were worthy of a crown. By her promptitude and decision she anticipated or suppressed the attempts of her opponents. At the head of her army she overawed the neighbouring princes, who were eager to humble the power of Wessex, and by the lenity of her sway, endeavoured to reconcile her subjects to the novelty of a female reign. Yet a general discontent prevailed; the chieftains conceived it a disgrace to submit to the sceptre of a woman, and she would probably have been driven from the throne, had not her death anticipated the attempt, before the first year of her reign was expired.³

The government of Wessex now assumed the form of an aristocracy. The most powerful thanes associated for their mutual defence, and in the emergencies of foreign war conferred on one of their number the title of king.⁴ The first of these was Æscuin, a descendant of Ceolwulf, who fought a bloody but indecisive battle with Wulphere, at Bedwin, in Wiltshire. He died or was expelled in the following year. Centwin, the brother of Coinwalch, succeeded, and the West Saxons under his conduct drove the Britons to the borders of the ocean. To escape his pursuit, many joined their brethren in Armorica.⁵

Among the numerous princes of the family of Cerdic was Cæadwalla, of the house of Ceawlin. His youth, activity, and courage had distinguished him above his equals; but the qualities which attracted the admiration of the people alarmed the jealousy of Centwin, and Cæadwalla, with a band of faithful adherents, retired from danger into the territory of Sussex. Yet the spirit of the fugitive scorned to solicit assistance from the enemies of his country, and in the extensive forests of Andredswald and Chiltene he maintained his independence.⁶ At

¹ Bed. iii. 7. Chron. Sax. 31, 32, 33, 39. Malm. f. 6.

² Chron. Sax. 33, 39. Bed. iii. 7; iv. 13. Hunt. 182.

³ Chron. Sax. 41. Westminster says she was dethroned (ad ann. 672); but I prefer the testimony of Malmesbury, f. 6.

⁴ This appears the only manner of reconciling the ancient chroniclers with Bede, iii. 12.

⁵ Chron. Sax. 44. Malm. 6. Hunt. 183. Ethel. 476.

⁶ De desertis Chiltene et Ondred.—Edd. c. xli. The forest of Andredswald has been already mentioned: Chiltene was probably in the eastern part of Hampshire, and in the district of the Meanwari, lately added to Sussex. Remains of the name still exist in Chilton, Chalton, &c.

Coronation of St. Wilfrid, the first Bishop of York.

the same time Wilfrid, the banished bishop of York, resided in Selsey, which had been given to him by Edilwalch. The similarity of their fortunes formed a bond of amity between the two exiles. Cæadwalla frequently visited the prelate, and received from him seasonable supplies of horses and money. Insensibly the number of his followers increased, adventurers and malcontents crowded to his standard, and he made a sudden and unexpected irruption into the cultivated part of Sussex. Edilwalch, who attempted with a few followers to oppose him, was slain, and the flames of war were spread over the country, when the ealdormen Bercthune and Andhune returned from Kent with the army of Sussex, and drove this band of outlaws to their former asylum in the forest. There Cæadwalla received the welcome intelligence that his persecutor Centwin was dead, and had generously, on his death-bed, named him his successor. He hastened into Wessex; his reputation had already interested the people in his favour, his rivals were intimidated by the martial appearance of his followers, and Cæadwalla ascended, without opposition, the throne of Cerdic.¹

The first care of the new king was to remove the disgrace which he had so lately received in Sussex. With a powerful army he entered that devoted country, slew Bercthune in battle, and reduced the natives to their former dependence on the crown of Wessex. Thence he pursued his victorious career into Kent. The inhabitants fled at his approach: and the riches of the open country became the spoil of the invaders.²

The Isle of Wight had been formerly subjugated and colonized by a body of Jutes. Wulphere had severed it from Wessex: Cæadwalla resolved to reunite it to his dominions. Though a pagan, he implored, in this difficult enterprise, the assistance of the god of the Christians, and vowed, in the event of victory, to devote one-fourth of his conquest to the service of religion. Arvald, who held the island under the crown of Sussex, defended himself with courage: and Cæadwalla received several wounds before he could subdue his antagonist. In his rage he had determined to exterminate the natives, and to supply their place with a colony of Saxons: but he yielded to the entreaties and exhortations of Wilfrid; and gave to the bishop, in execution of his vow, three hundred hides of land, the fourth portion of the island. By him the donation was transferred to the clergyman Bernwine, his nephew, who, with the assistance of Hiddela, established the Christian faith among the inhabitants.³

During this invasion, two young princes, the brothers of Arvald, had escaped from the island, and sought an asylum among the Jutes of the opposite coast. They were concealed at Stoneham: but the place of their retreat was betrayed to Cæadwalla, and an order was despatched for their immediate execution. Cynibert, the abbot of Redbridge, hastened to solicit, and with difficulty obtained, a respite, till he should baptize the unfortunate youths. He hastened to Stoneham, informed them of their approaching end, consoled them with the hope of future happiness, and explained to them the leading doctrines of Christianity. They listened to him with gratitude; the ceremony of baptism was performed; and the two brothers joyfully offered their necks to the sword, "in the certain hope," says Bede, "of exchanging a temporary for an immortal and blissful existence."¹

¹ Edd. c. xli. Bed. iv. 15. Chron. Sax. 45. Malms. 161.

² Bed. iv. 15. Chron. Sax. p. 46. Hunt. 192.

³ Bed. iv. 16.

The next theatre of his vengeance, or his ambition, was the kingdom of Kent. His brother Mollo commanded the West-Saxon army; and the natives, recurring to the policy which they had adopted in the former year, retired at the approach of the invaders. Mollo, whom the absence of an enemy had rendered negligent, incautiously separated from his forces with twelve attendants. He was desecrated by the peasants, attacked, hunted into a cottage, and burnt to death. Caadwalla hastened to revenge the fate of his brother; and devoted the whole of Kent to the flames and the sword.²

From his first acquaintance with Wilfrid, the king had imbibed a favourable notion of the Christian worship: when he had mounted the throne, he invited the bishop into Wessex, honoured him as his father and benefactor, and determined to embrace the faith of the gospel. Another prince would have been content to receive baptism from his own prelate or his instructor: Caadwalla resolved to receive it from the hands of the sovereign pontiff. He crossed the sea, visited in his progress the most celebrated churches, testified his piety by costly presents, was honourably entertained by Cunibert, king of the Lombards, and entered Rome in the spring of the year 688. On the vigil of Easter he was baptized by Pope Sergius, and changed his name to that of Peter, in honour of the prince of the apostles. But before he laid aside the white robes, the usual distinction of those who had been lately baptized, he was seized with a mortal illness, and died on the twentieth of April, in the thirtieth year of his age. By the command of Sergius he was interred in the church of St. Peter; and an inscription fixed on the tomb preserved the memory, and celebrated the virtues, of the king of the West Saxons.³

The successor of Caadwalla was Ina, who derived his descent from the Bretwalda Ceawlin. As a warrior, Ina was equal, as a legislator he was superior, to the most celebrated of his predecessors. In the fifth year of his reign he assembled the Witenagemot, and "with the advice of his father Cenred, of his bishops Hedda and Erconwald, of his ealdormen, and wise men, and clergy," enacted seventy-nine laws, by which he regulated the administration of justice, fixed the legal compensation for crimes, checked the prevalence of hereditary feuds, placed the conquered Britons under the protection of the state, and exposed and punished the frauds, which might be committed in the transfer of merchandise, and the cultivation of land.⁴ Essex (by what means is unknown) had already been annexed to his crown;⁵ and Kent was again destined to lament the day in which Mollo had perished. At the head of a resistless army Ina demanded the were for the death of his cousin; and Withred, king of Kent, to appease the resentment of the invader, paid the full compensation,—thirty thousand pounds of silver.⁶ The West-

¹ Bed. iv. 16.

² Chron. Sax. p. 48.

³ Chron. Sax. p. 48. Bed. v. 7. The concluding lines of his epitaph were these:—

Candidus inter oves Christi sociabilis
ibit:

Corpore nam tumulum, mente superna tenet.

Committasse magis sceptrorum insignia credas,

Quem regnum Christi promeruisse vides.—Ibid.

⁴ Leges Sax. p. 14—27.

⁵ Malm. 7. Ina calls the bishop of London, "my bishop."—Leg. Sax. p. 14.

⁶ Chron. Sax. p. 48. Polychron. p. 243. Malmesbury (7) has too great a sum, 30,000 marks of gold. Florence of Worcester makes it amount to 3,700 pounds.—Flor. ad ann. 694.

Saxon monarch steadily pursued the policy of his fathers in the gradual subjugation of the Britons; added by successive conquests several districts to the western provinces of his kingdom; and expelled, after long struggles, Geraint, the king of Cornwall. His dispute with Ceolred of Mercia was more bloody and less glorious. The battle was fought at Wodnesbury. Both claimed the victory: but neither dared to renew the engagement.¹

If the abilities of Ina had promoted the prosperity of Wessex, the duration of his reign exhausted the patience of the more aspiring among the descendants of Cerdic. He had swayed the sceptre two-and-thirty years, when the etheling Cenulf ventured to claim the royal authority, and in a short time paid the forfeit of his ambition.² The next year his example was followed by another pretender, named Eadbyrht; who seized the strong castle of Taunton, which Ina had lately erected in Somersetshire. It was at the moment when an insurrection had drawn the king into Sussex: but his queen Ethelburga assembled an army, took the fortress by storm, and levelled it with the ground. Eadbyrht had the good fortune to escape from his pursuers, and was raised by the enemies of Ina to the throne of Sussex. During two years the natives successfully maintained the struggle for their independence, but in the third they were defeated, and the death of Eadbyrht consummated the subjection of their country.³

Ina was the friend and benefactor of the churchmen. All the celebrated monasteries in his kingdom experienced his bounty, and the abbey of Glastonbury was erected by him with a munificence truly royal.⁴ The religious sentiments which he had imbibed in early life sunk more deeply into his mind as he advanced in years, and their influence was strengthened by the exhortations of his queen, who ardently wished for the retirement of the cloister. With this view, if we may credit the narrative of Malmsbury, she devised and executed the most singular stratagem. The king and queen had given a splendid entertainment to the nobility and clergy of the kingdom. The following morning they left the castle, but after a ride of a few hours, Ina, at the earnest solicitation of Ethelburga, consented to return. He was surprised at the silence and solitude which appeared to reign in the castle. At each step his astonishment increased. The furniture had disappeared, the hall was strewn with fragments and rubbish, and a litter of swine occupied the very bed in which he had passed the night. His eyes interrogated the queen, who seized the moment to read her husband a lecture on the vanity of human greatness, and the happy serenity of an obscure and religious life.⁵ It is not, however, necessary to have recourse to the story. There are other grounds on which the determination of Ina may be explained, without attributing it to so clumsy an artifice. He had now reigned seven-and-thirty years. The peace of his old age had been disturbed by rebellion. His body was broken by infirmity, his mind distracted by care. Experience had taught him how difficult it was to hold with a feeble hand the reins of government among a warlike

¹ Chron. Sax. p. 50, 51. Hunt. 193, 194.

² Chron. Sax. p. 52. Flor. Wig. ad ann. 721.

³ Chron. Sax. p. 52. Hunt. 194.

⁴ Malm. de Ant. Glast. edit. Gale, p. 310. His donations amounted to 2,900 pounds of silver, and 350 pounds of gold.—Ibid. I should think this money arose from the were paid for the death of Mollo: as Ina built the monastery pro anima propinqui sui Mollonis.—Gale, 309. Monast. Ang. i. 13.

⁵ Malm. 7.

and turbulent nobility. He resolved to descend spontaneously from that situation, which he could no longer retain with dignity, and religion offered to his grey hairs a safe and a holy retreat. In the Witena-gemot he resigned the crown, released his subjects from their allegiance, and expressed his wish to spend the remainder of his days in lamenting the errors of his youth. Within a few weeks the royal penitent, accompanied by Ethelburga, quitted Wessex. To watch and pray at the tombs of the apostles Peter and Paul, was the first object of their wishes, and after a tedious journey they arrived in Rome, and visited the holy places. It may be, as some writers have asserted, that Ina then built the school of the English in that city:¹ but this circumstance was unknown to the more ancient historians, and can hardly be reconciled with the humility of the king, whose endeavour it was to elude the notice of the public, and to live confounded with the mass of the common people. On this account he refused to shave his head, or wear the monastic habit, and continued to support himself by the labour of his hands, and to perform his devotions in the garb of a poor and unknown pilgrim. He died before the expiration of the year, and was followed to the grave by Ethelburga, the consort of his greatness, and the faithful companion of his poverty and repentance.²

When Ina resigned the sceptre, he recommended for his successors, Æthelheard, the brother of his queen, and Oswald, who through Ethelbald, Cynebald, and Cuthwin, traced his descent from Ceawlin.³ The two princes immediately became antago-nists; Oswald, though defeated, did not relinquish his pretensions, and till his death in 730, Æthelheard reigned in anxiety and suspense. This domestic quarrel impaired the power, and emboldened the enemies, of Wessex. The British writers claim for their countrymen the glory of three victories, obtained in North Wales, South Wales, and Cornwall.⁴ The superiority of the Mercians is better established. Æthelheard was compelled to obey the authority of Ethelbald, king of Mercia; and an unsuccessful attempt to recover his independence, was chastised by the loss of Somerton, the capital of Somersetshire. After an inglorious reign of thirteen years, he left his crown to his brother Cuthred.⁵

Cuthred first drew his sword to revenge the death of his son, the etheling Cenric, who had been slain in a sedition of the people. The perpetrators of the crime, apprehensive of punishment, took up arms, and placed at their head the ealdorman Edilhun. Their army was inferior to that of the king, but the bravery of their leader supplied the deficiency of numbers, and the victory was doubtful, till a dangerous wound removed the ealdorman from the field. The conqueror behaved with generosity to his vanquished subjects, and restored Edilhun to his favour. The services of that nobleman in the great victory of Burford have been already mentioned. By his assistance the king defeated the Mercians, and secured the independence of Wessex. An expedition against the Britons, which added a considerable district to his dominions, closed the career of this warlike monarch, who died in 754.⁶

¹ West. ad ann. 727. He also attributes to Ina the establishment of Peter-pence, which is equally improbable.

² Bed. v. 7. Chron. Sax. p. 52. Malm. 7. Gale, 313.

³ Bed. v. 7. Chron. Sax. p. 53.

⁴ Caradoc, p. 16.

⁵ Chron. Sax. p. 54. Hunt. 195.

⁶ Ibid. 56. Hunt. 196. Carad. 116.

Sigebyrcht succeeded to the crown. Before the end of the year, the majority of the thanes rejected his authority, and elected a descendant of Cerdic, by name Cynewulf. Hampshire alone, by the influence of the ealdorman Cumbra, remained faithful to Sigebyrcht: but that nobleman having presumed to remonstrate with him on his conduct, was put to death by his ungrateful master. The loss of their leader dissolved the connexion between the Hampshire-men and the king: they united with their countrymen in acknowledging the claim of Cynewulf; and Sigebyrcht fled with precipitation to the forest of Andredswald. There he wandered for almost a year; till he was accidentally discovered at Prevet by one of the retainers of Cumbra, who, to revenge the death of his lord, thrust his spear through the body of the fugitive prince. He is said to have been buried with royal honours at Winchester.¹

Of the long reign of Cynewulf we know little more than that it was signalized by several victories over the Britons, and disgraced by the surrender of Bensington to the Mercians. But the history of his death deserves to be preserved, as illustrative of two great features in the Anglo-Saxon character,—devotedness of attachment, and ferocity of revenge. Sigebyrcht had left a brother named Cyneheard, who, to escape the jealousy of the new king, abandoned his native country, and consoled the hours of exile with the hope of revenge. Thirty-one years had elapsed from the death of Sigebyrcht, when Cyneheard returned with eighty-four adherents, and secreted himself in the woods. It chanced one evening that the king left Winchester with a slender retinue to visit a female at Merton, to whom he was warmly attached. Cyneheard stole silently from his retreat, followed with caution the footsteps of the monarch; and in the dead of the night surrounded the residence of his mistress. Cynewulf was asleep; his attendants were dispersed in the neighbouring houses. At the first alarm he rose, seized his sword, and descended to the door, where he desecrated his enemy, and springing forward aimed a desperate blow at the head of Cyneheard. The wound, which was but slight, was quickly revenged by the weapons of the conspirators. Roused by the noise of the combatants and the shrieks of the woman, the king's attendants hastened to his assistance; but they found him breathless, and weltering in blood. It was in vain that Cyneheard offered them their lives and possessions. They scorned his proposals; and after a long conflict were all slain, with the exception of a Briton, who, in quality of hostage, had been detained in the court of Cynewulf. Even he was severely wounded.

Early in the morning the news arrived at Winchester. The ealdorman Osric, and Wiveth the thane, immediately mounted their horses, and rode to Merton, followed by their retainers. Cyneheard met them at the gate to justify his conduct, and to solicit their friendship. He pleaded the obligation of revenging the wrongs of his family; asserted his claim to the throne; offered them valuable possessions; and bade them recollect that many of his friends were their kinsmen. "Our kinsmen," they replied, "are not dearer to us than was our lord. To his murderers we will never submit. If those, who are related to us, wish to save their lives, they are at liberty to depart." "The same offer," returned the followers of Cyneheard, "was made to the king's attendants. They refused it. We will prove to-day that our generosity is not inferior to theirs." Impatient of delay, Osric forced the barrier: he was opposed with the most desperate intrepidity; and the battle was terminated only by the failure of combatants. Of Cyneheard's eighty-four companions, one alone was saved. He was found among the slain, covered with wounds but still alive; and owed his preservation to this fortunate circumstance, that he was the godson of Osric. The body of Cynewulf was interred among the ashes of his progenitors at Winchester, that of Cyneheard was conveyed to the church of Axminster.¹

¹ Chron. Sax. 56. Ethelw. 477. Hunt. 196.

The vacant throne was next occupied by Brihtric. The West-Saxon thanes had still retained the ancient privilege of electing their kings. Though they confined their choice to the descendants of Cerdic, they frequently disregarded the order of hereditary succession. This practice was productive of the most serious evils. Every prince of the royal race nourished the hope of ascending the throne; and, as the unsuccessful candidate often appealed to the sword, the strength of the nation was impaired by domestic dissensions; and the reigning king was frequently compelled to divert his attention from the general welfare to his own individual security. The opponent of Brihtric was Egbert, who, unable to withstand the power of his enemy, left the island, and sought employment in the armies of Charlemagne. Of the exploits of the king, during the sixteen years of his reign, historians are silent: the circumstances of his death, on account of its consequences, have arrested their attention. Brihtric had married Eadburga, the daughter of Offa, a princess as ambitious and unprincipled as her father.

By her imperious temper she governed her husband, and, through him, the whole nation. The king had noticed with particular distinction the ealdorman Worr. Jealous of the rising influence of this young nobleman Eadburga prepared for him a poisonous potion: but unfortunately the king drank of the same cup, and accompanied his favourite to the grave. The West Saxons vented their imprecations against the murderer, who escaped with her treasures to France; and the Witenagemot enacted a law, by which the consorts of the future kings were deprived of the style and privileges of royalty. Eadburga was presented to Charlemagne, and when the jeering monarch asked her, whom she would have, him or his son, "Your son," she replied, "for he is the younger." The emperor was, or affected to be, displeased; but made her a present of an opulent monastery, in which she resided with the title of abbess. Soon, however, her dissolute conduct scandalized the sisterhood, and the public. She was expelled with ignominy, and after many adventures, terminated her miserable existence at Pavia in Italy, where the daughter of the king of Mercia, and widow of the king of Wessex, was often seen soliciting in rags the charity of passengers. Brihtric died in the year 800.²

EGBERT.

The expulsion of Egbert, and his reception at the court of Charlemagne, have been already mentioned. Three years he served in the armies of that emperor, and improved the period of his exile in acquiring a proficiency in the arts of war and government. The death of Brihtric recalled him to his native country. He was the only remaining prince of the house of Cerdic, deriving his descent from that conqueror, through Inigils, the brother of Ina. By the West-Saxon thanes his claim was unanimously acknowledged; and the day of his coronation was ennobled by a victory, the omen of subsequent conquests. Desirous perhaps to disturb the joy of the ceremony, Ethulmund, the Mercian ealdorman of Gloucestershire, attempted with a body of horsemen to cross the Isis at Kempford, and was opposed by Wulstan, the West-Saxon ealdorman of Wiltshire. Both the commanders fell in the engagement; but the Mercians were routed and pursued with considerable loss into their own territory.¹

¹ Chron. Sax. 67, 63. Hunt. 196, 197. Flor. ad ann. 784. Malm. 7. Ethelw. 477. Westm. ad ann. 786. They all agree in substance, but differ in minor circumstances. I have selected those which appear the most probable.

² Saxon Chronicle, 63, 68. Asser, p. 10, 12.

Egbert devoted the commencement of his reign to the cultivation of peace, and the improvement of his people. It was not till 809 that he unsheathed the sword: but from that period each succeeding year was marked by new victories and conquests. He repeatedly invaded and appropriated to himself a portion of the territory of the ancient Britons: the havoc of war and the flames of destruction were carried to the western extremity of the island; and the natives of Cornwall, exhausted by numerous defeats, reluctantly submitted to the conqueror.² The East Angles, who still remembered the treachery of Offa, by entreaties and presents induced him to make war upon the Mercians. The two armies met at Ellendune, on the banks of the Willy; and Beornwulf, after an obstinate resistance, yielded the palm of victory to his adversary, who, seizing the favourable moment, overran the feeble kingdoms of Kent and Essex, and united them to his own dominions. Beornwulf, and after him his successor Ludecan, sought to wreak their vengeance on the East Angles.³ Both lost their lives in the fruitless attempt; and Wiglaf, who next ascended the throne, had scarcely grasped the sceptre, when he was compelled to drop it at the approach of the West Saxons. Unable to collect an army, he endeavoured to elude the pursuit of the invaders; wandered for three years in the forests and marshes; and during four months obtained a secure retreat in the cell of Etheldride, the daughter of Offa, who lived a recluse in the church of Croyland. Time, and the entreaties of the abbot Siward, mitigated the resentment of Egbert; who at last permitted Wiglaf to retain the sceptre, on condition that he should pay an annual tribute, and swear fealty to the king of Wessex.⁴ By the submission of the Mercians and of the East Angles, Egbert found himself on the frontiers of Northumbria, which was already subdued by the terror of his name. The chieftains, with Eanfrid at their head, met him at Dore, acknowledged him for their lord, and gave hostages for their obedience. Thence he directed his arms against the Britons, penetrated through the heart of North Wales, and planted his victorious standard in the isle of Anglesey. Thus in the space of nineteen years did Egbert, by his policy and victories, extend the authority of Wessex over the greater part of the island, and obtain for himself the honourable title of "the eighth Bretwalda."⁵

Scarcely, however, had the king

¹ Chron. Sax. 68.

² Chron. Sax. p. 69, 70. Ethelweard, 478.

³ *Prece pretioque.—Ingul. 7. Chron. Sax. p. 70.

⁴ Ingul. 7, 8.

⁵ Chron. Sax. 71, 72. Ethelw. 478. The opinion that he gave himself the title of the first king of England, rests on no sufficient authority. Several of his predecessors had as good a right to it as himself; and his immediate successors contented themselves with the usual style of kings of the West Saxons. By Monarcha Britannie, Huntingdon (1289) probably means no more than Bretwalda.

attained this superiority over the native princes, when he saw himself assailed by a foreign and most dangerous enemy. At this period the peninsula of Jutland, the islands of the Baltic, and the shores of the Scandinavian continent, were the birth-place of a race of men, who, like the Saxons of old, spent the best portion of their lives on the waves, despised the tranquil enjoyments of peace, and preferred the acquisitions of rapine to the laborious profits of industry. Their maritime situation familiarized them with the dangers of the ocean; and an absurd law of succession, which universally prevailed among a multitude of chieftains, consigned the majority of their children to the profession of piracy. The eldest son obtained the whole patrimony of his family: the rest of the brothers received no other inheritance than their swords and ships, with which they were expected to acquire reputation and riches.¹ Till the eighth century the sea-kings (so the principal of these adventurers were called) confined their depredations to the northern seas: but they had heard of the wealthy provinces in the south; and the success of their attempts incited them to engage in more distant and important expeditions. Several chieftains associated under the banner of a renowned and experienced leader. In spring, the pirates sailed to a distant province; landed, ravaged the country, collected the spoil, steered to another coast, repeated their depredations; and in autumn returned laden with plunder to their own country. Their first attempts were directed against the British isles: next they desolated the coasts of France and Spain; at last they sailed through the straits which divide Europe from Africa, and taught the shores of the Mediterranean to tremble at the names of the Danes and Northmen. The establishment of a Danish dynasty in England, of the duchy of Normandy in France, and afterwards of a powerful kingdom in Italy, bears sufficient testimony to their courage, their activity, and their perseverance.

Of their descents in England during the eighth century, three only are recorded, one on the Isle of Thanet, and two on the coast of Northumbria. If these attempts produced a temporary alarm, they furnished no cause of permanent uneasiness. But towards the close of the reign of Egbert, the numbers of the pirates perpetually increased, and their visits were annually renewed. In 832 they landed in the Isle of Sheppy, conveyed away the plunder, and returned home without molestation. The next year a fleet of five-and-thirty sail entered the mouth of the Dart, and Egbert had the mortification to see his West Saxons turn their backs to the invaders. Convinced of the necessity of preparation, he summoned all his vassals to meet him in London, explained to them the measures which he had resolved to adopt, and waited in anxious suspense for the next descent of the enemy. Nor were they inferior in policy to the king. They landed on the coast of Cornwall, where, by the offers of friendship, they seduced the Britons from their allegiance, and at Hengstone-hill encountered with united forces the men of Wessex. The king commanded in person; and a bloody but decisive victory restored the glory of his arms, crushed the rebellion of the Britons, and compelled the invaders to seek refuge in their ships. This was the last exploit of Egbert, who died, after a long, a glorious, and a fortunate reign.²

¹ Gale, 533. Snorre, Havnise, 1777, p. 43. Messen, Stockholme, 1700, p. 4.

² Ethelw. 478. Hunt. 198. Ing. 10. Chron. Sax. ann. 836. But Egbert died

ETHELWULF.

Egbert, about the middle of his reign, had moulded the petty kingdoms of Kent, Essex, and Sussex into one government, which he gave to his elder son Ethelwulf, with the title of king.¹ Ethelwulf, on the death of his father, succeeded to the higher throne of Wessex, and transferred this subordinate kingdom to his son Athelstan.²

Of this monarch it has frequently been observed, that he was fitter to wear the cowl than to wield the sceptre. For so unfavourable a character he is principally indebted to the pen of Malmsbury, who describes him as a prince of inferior abilities, and assigns the merit of his government to the wisdom of his ministers, Alstan, bishop of Sherborne, and Swithin, bishop of Winchester. But the accuracy of this statement may be questioned. In the pages of the more ancient annalists Ethelwulf appears with greater dignity; and if we may estimate his character by his conduct, we cannot refuse him the praise of activity and courage.

The education of his more early years had been confided to Swithin, provost of Winchester, and the care of the tutor was repaid by Egbert with the office of royal chaplain. From the lessons of his preceptor, the young prince was removed to study the military art under the auspices of his father; and after the victory of Ellendune, he commanded the army which expelled Baldred, king of Kent, from his dominions, and annexed that province, with Surrey and Essex, to the ancient patrimony of the house of Cerdic. As soon as he had mounted the throne, he bestowed upon his former tutor the vacant bishopric of Winchester; but retained at the head of the council the experienced bishop of Sherborne. The incessant and desultory invasions of the Northmen suggested the propriety of appointing officers in the maritime districts, who, on the first alarm, might collect the inhabitants, and oppose the landing or progress of the enemy; and this arrangement, though, by dividing the force of the country, it lessened the chance of victory, generally succeeded in confining the depredations of the invaders to the vicinity of the coast. The whole island was now surrounded by their squadrons. While one occupied the attention of Ethelwulf, a second of thirty-three sail entered the port of Southampton, and soon afterwards a third effected a landing on the Isle of Portland. Of the king's success we are not informed. Wulfere defeated the invaders at Southampton, but Ethelhelm was slain at Portland with many of the men of Dorset. The next spring a powerful army landed in Lincolnshire. The caldorman Herebryht, with his fol-in 838 or 839, according to a charter of Ethelwulf dated anno ab incarnatione Christi DCCCXXXVIII. indictione ii. primo videlicet anno regni Ethelwulfi regis post obitum patris sui.—Cod. Dipl. i. 321.

¹ The chroniclers assign the conquest of Kent to the year 823 or 824. In 827 we first meet with Ethelwulf Rex, and in 828 Egbert says of him—quem regem constituimus in Cantia.—Cod. Dipl. i. 287. Athelstan was the son of Ethelwulf.—Ethelward, i. c. 2.

² Malmsbury (de Pont. l. ii. f. 137) tells us that Ethelwulf, at the death of his father, was a subdeacon; but that a dispensation for him to ascend the throne was obtained from Leo III., because he was the only surviving descendant of Cerdic. But Leo had then been dead more than twenty years; and Athelstan was living, and might have governed Wessex as well as Kent. The story itself appears to have been unknown to all preceding writers, and even to Malmsbury when he wrote his History of the Kings (de Reg. 20). The tale of Ethelwulf having been bishop of Winchester is still less entitled to credit. Both reports probably arose from confounding together different persons with the same or similar names. Thus in the ancient life of St. Neot (Act. SS. Bened. sæc. iv. tom. ii. p. 325), the bishop of Winchester his contemporary, and Ethelwold, who was bishop a century afterwards, are both described as the same person.

lowers, perished in the marshes; and the barbarians pushed their victorious career through East Anglia to the Thames. The following year three bloody battles were fought at Rochester, Canterbury, and London; and Ethelwulf himself was defeated in an action at Charmouth with thirty-five sail of the enemy.¹

Whether it was that the pirates were discouraged by the obstinate resistance which they experienced, or that France, now become the theatre of intestine feuds and fraternal ambition, offered a more inviting prospect, they appear to have abandoned Britain for the next ten years, while they visited and revisited with impunity the different provinces on the coast of Gaul. But in 851 several squadrons, as if by common consent, returned to the island. One army had landed the preceding autumn in the Isle of Thanet, and had passed the winter on shore, a circumstance which filled the Saxons with consternation, as it seemed to denote a design of permanent conquest. In the spring a fleet of three hundred and fifty sail ascended the Thames; Canterbury and London were sacked, and Bertulf, the tributary king of Mercia, to whom the defence of the district had been assigned, was defeated.² The barbarians turned to the left, and entered Surrey, where Ethelwulf with his West Saxons waited to receive them at Okeley. The battle that ensued was the subject of a poem, fragments of which have been preserved by the ancient chroniclers. It was most obstinate and sanguinary. The victory remained to Ethelwulf, and the loss of the Danes is said to have been greater than they had ever sustained in any age or country. The other divisions of the Saxon forces were equally successful. Ceorl, with the men of Devon, defeated the barbarians at Wenbury, and Athelstan, king of Kent, captured nine of their ships in an engagement near Sandwich. So many victories gave to this the name of the prosperous year; and the Northmen, disheartened by their losses, respected during the remainder of Ethelwulf's reign the shores of Britain.³

Burhred, king of Mercia, the successor of Bertulf, had determined to chastise the insolence of the Welsh, who made frequent incursions into his territories. Merfyn Frych, their sovereign, fell in the battle, but Roderic Mawr succeeded to the throne, and defied all the power of the Mercian. Burhred had recourse to his superior lord, the king of Wessex, and Ethelwulf, uniting his forces with those of his vassal, penetrated through Wales as far as the Isle of Anglesey, and compelled the natives to acknowledge the ancient superiority of the king of Mercia. At his return he gave his daughter Ethelwitha in marriage to Burhred, and the nuptials were celebrated with royal magnificence at Chippenham.⁴

The repeated invasions of the barbarians induced Ethelwulf frequently to consult the assembly of his thanes. On one of these occasions, by their advice, and with their consent, he published a charter, of which the copies are so different, and the language is so obscure, that it is difficult to ascertain its real object; whether it were to exempt from all secular services the tenth part of each manor, whoever might be the possessor, or to annex that portion of land to the

¹ Chron. Sax. 73, 74. Asser, Annal. 155. About this time occurred the wars between the Scots and Picts, which ended in the subjugation of the latter by Kenneth, king of Scots, in 842.—Fordun, iv. 6, 8.

² Chron. Sax. 74. Asser, 5, 6. Ing. 11.

³ Chron. Sax. 74, 75. Asser, 5, 6. The Danes made one or two descents afterwards, but of little importance.

⁴ Chron. Sax. 75. Asser, 6, 7. Caradoc, 27.

possessions which had already been settled on the church. That the grant, however, was highly advantageous to the clergy, is evident from the engagement of the bishops of Sherborne and Winchester, who appointed the Wednesday of each week as a day of public supplication, to implore the divine assistance against the Danes. This charter was at first confined to the kingdom of Wessex, but in a council of the tributary states, held at Winchester in 855, it was extended to all the nations of the Saxons.¹

The pious curiosity which had induced so many of the Saxon princes and prelates to visit the city of Rome, was not yet extinguished in the breasts of their posterity. The bishop of Winchester had lately performed the journey, and had been accompanied by Alfred, the youngest and best-beloved of the sons of Ethelwulf, a boy in the fifth year of his age. The prince was honourably received by the pontiff Leo IV., who, at the request of his father, conferred on him the regal unction, and the sacrament of confirmation.² In 855, the tranquillity which England enjoyed encouraged Ethelwulf to undertake the same journey. Attended by a splendid retinue, the royal pilgrim, with his son Alfred, crossed the Channel, visited the most celebrated churches of Gaul, and was sumptuously entertained at the court of Charles the Bald, king of France. At Rome he spent several months in viewing the remains of ancient magnificence, and indulging his devotion at the shrines of the apostles. He rebuilt the school or hospital of the Saxons, which had lately been burnt, made numerous presents to the pope, the nobles, the clergy, and the people of Rome, and solicited an ordinance that no Englishman should be condemned to do penance in irons out of his own country.³

In his return he again visited the French monarch, and after a courtship of three months was married to his daughter Judith, who probably had not yet reached her twelfth year. The ceremony was performed by Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims. At the conclusion the princess was crowned, and seated on a throne by the side of her husband, a distinction which she afterwards claimed, to the great displeasure of the West Saxons.

Ancient writers have not mentioned to whom Ethelwulf had intrusted the reins of government during his absence. But Ethelbald, his eldest son, a prince of impetuous passions and insatiable ambition, conceived the design of seizing the throne for himself, and of holding it in defiance of his father. His advisers

¹ See the charters in Wilk. p. 183. Spelm. p. 348. Ing. 17. Gale, 359. Westm. 153. Also Chron. Sax. 76. Ailred. 351. Asser, 8. Ethelw. 478. Dugdale, Mon. 1, 32, 100. Hunt. 200. Malm. de Pont. 360.

² Asser, 7. Chron. Sax. 77. Why did the king request the pope to crown Alfred at so early an age? Different reasons have been suggested by ancient and modern writers. Perhaps it was to secure his succession to the crown after his brothers, to the exclusion of their children. Such at least was Ethelwulf's determination in his will.

³ Asser, 8, 9. Chron. Sax. 76. Anastas. Biblioth. ii. 206, 207. Par. 1649. Annal. Bertin. apud Bouquet, viii. 72, 268, 620. For parricide and other enormous crimes, the bishops were accustomed to condemn penitents to wear irons for a certain number of years, and on some occasions sent them to Rome to be absolved by the pope. One of these criminals is thus described by Walsart of Winchester, an eye-witness:—

*Occidit proprium crudeli morte parentem,
Unde reo statim præcepit episcopus urbis, Ferreus ut ventrem constringeret acriter
omnem Circulus, et similem paterentur brachia pœnam, Continuosque novem semet cruciando per
annos,
Atria sacrorum lustraret sæpe locorum,
Viseret et sacri pulcherrima limina Petri,
Quo veniam tantæ mereretur sumere
culpæ.*

Act. Bened. sæc. iv. tom. ii. p. 72.

lowers, perished in the marshes; and the barbarians pushed their victorious career through East Anglia to the Thames. The following year three bloody battles were fought at Rochester, Canterbury, and London; and Ethelwulf himself was defeated in an action at Charnmouth with thirty-five sail of the enemy.¹

Whether it was that the pirates were discouraged by the obstinate resistance which they experienced, or that France, now become the theatre of intestine feuds and fraternal ambition, offered a more inviting prospect, they appear to have abandoned Britain for the next ten years, while they visited and revisited with impunity the different provinces on the coast of Gaul. But in 851 several squadrons, as if by common consent, returned to the island. One army had landed the preceding autumn in the Isle of Thanet, and had passed the winter on shore, a circumstance which filled the Saxons with consternation, as it seemed to denote a design of permanent conquest. In the spring a fleet of three hundred and fifty sail ascended the Thames; Canterbury and London were sacked, and Bertulf, the tributary king of Mercia, to whom the defence of the district had been assigned, was defeated.² The barbarians turned to the left, and entered Surrey, where Ethelwulf with his West Saxons waited to receive them at Okeley. The battle that ensued was the subject of a poem, fragments of which have been preserved by the ancient chroniclers. It was most obstinate and sanguinary. The victory remained to Ethelwulf, and the loss of the Danes is said to have been greater than they had ever sustained in any age or country. The other divisions of the Saxon forces were equally successful. Ceorl, with the men of Devon, defeated the barbarians at Wenbury, and Athelstan, king of Kent, captured nine of their ships in an engagement near Sandwich. So many victories gave to this the name of the prosperous year; and the Northmen, disheartened by their losses, respected during the remainder of Ethelwulf's reign the shores of Britain.³

Burhred, king of Mercia, the successor of Bertulf, had determined to chastise the insolence of the Welsh, who made frequent incursions into his territories. Merfyn Frych, their sovereign, fell in the battle, but Roderic Mawr succeeded to the throne, and defied all the power of the Mercian. Burhred had recourse to his superior lord, the king of Wessex, and Ethelwulf, uniting his forces with those of his vassal, penetrated through Wales as far as the Isle of Anglesey, and compelled the natives to acknowledge the ancient superiority of the king of Mercia. At his return he gave his daughter Ethelswitha in marriage to Burhred, and the nuptials were celebrated with royal magnificence at Chippenham.⁴

The repeated invasions of the barbarians induced Ethelwulf frequently to consult the assembly of his thanes. On one of these occasions, by their advice, and with their consent, he published a charter, of which the copies are so different, and the language is so obscure, that it is difficult to ascertain its real object; whether it were to exempt from all secular services the tenth part of each manor, whoever might be the possessor, or to annex that portion of land to the

¹ Chron. Sax. 73, 74. Asser, Annal. 155. About this time occurred the wars between the Scots and Picts, which ended in the subjugation of the latter by Kenneth, king of Scots, in 842.—Fordun, iv. 6, 8.

² Chron. Sax. 74. Asser, 5, 6. Ing. 11.

³ Chron. Sax. 74, 75. Asser, 5, 6. The Danes made one or two descents afterwards, but of little importance.

⁴ Chron. Sax. 75. Asser, 6, 7. Caradoc, 27.

possessions which had already been settled on the church. That the grant, however, was highly advantageous to the clergy, is evident from the engagement of the bishops of Sherborne and Winchester, who appointed the Wednesday of each week as a day of public supplication, to implore the divine assistance against the Danes. This charter was at first confined to the kingdom of Wessex, but in a council of the tributary states, held at Winchester in 855, it was extended to all the nations of the Saxons.¹

The pious curiosity which had induced so many of the Saxon princes and prelates to visit the city of Rome, was not yet extinguished in the breasts of their posterity. The bishop of Winchester had lately performed the journey, and had been accompanied by Alfred, the youngest and best-beloved of the sons of Ethelwulf, a boy in the fifth year of his age. The prince was honourably received by the pontiff Leo IV., who, at the request of his father, conferred on him the regal unction, and the sacrament of confirmation.² In 855, the tranquillity which England enjoyed encouraged Ethelwulf to undertake the same journey. Attended by a splendid retinue, the royal pilgrim, with his son Alfred, crossed the Channel, visited the most celebrated churches of Gaul, and was sumptuously entertained at the court of Charles the Bald, king of France. At Rome he spent several months in viewing the remains of ancient magnificence, and indulging his devotion at the shrines of the apostles. He rebuilt the school or hospital of the Saxons, which had lately been burnt, made numerous presents to the pope, the nobles, the clergy, and the people of Rome, and solicited an ordinance that no Englishman should be condemned to do penance in irons out of his own country.³

In his return he again visited the French monarch, and after a courtship of three months was married to his daughter Judith, who probably had not yet reached her twelfth year. The ceremony was performed by Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims. At the conclusion the princess was crowned, and seated on a throne by the side of her husband, a distinction which she afterwards claimed, to the great displeasure of the West Saxons.

Ancient writers have not mentioned to whom Ethelwulf had intrusted the reins of government during his absence. But Ethelbald, his eldest son, a prince of impetuous passions and insatiable ambition, conceived the design of seizing the throne for himself, and of holding it in defiance of his father. His advisers

¹ See the charters in Wilk. p. 183. Spelm. p. 348. Ing. 17. Gale. 359. Westm. 158. Also Chron. Sax. 76. Ailred. 351. Asser, 8. Ethelw. 478. Dugdale, Mon. 1, 32, 100. Hunt. 200. Malm. de Pont. 360.

² Asser, 7. Chron. Sax. 77. Why did the king request the pope to crown Alfred at so early an age? Different reasons have been suggested by ancient and modern writers. Perhaps it was to secure his succession to the crown after his brothers, to the exclusion of their children. Such at least was Ethelwulf's determination in his will.

³ Asser, 8, 9. Chron. Sax. 76. Anastas. Biblioth. ii. 206, 207. Par. 1649. Annal. Bertin. apud Bouquet, viii. 72, 268, 620. For parricide and other enormous crimes, the bishops were accustomed to condemn penitents to wear irons for a certain number of years, and on some occasions sent them to Rome to be absolved by the pope. One of these criminals is thus described by Walsatan of Winchester, an eye-witness :—

*Occidit proprium crudeli morte parentem,
Unde reo statim præcepit episcopus urbis,
Ferreus ut ventrem constringeret acriter
omnem Circulus, et simulæ paterentur brachia penam, Continuosque novem semet cruciando per
annos,
Atria sacrorum lustraret sæpe locorum,
Viseret et sacri pulcherrima limina Petri,
Quo veniam tantæ mereretur sumere
culpe.*

Act. Bened. sæc. iv. tom. ii. p. 72.

and accomplices were Alstan, the celebrated bishop of Sherborne, and Eanwulf, the ealdorman of Somerset. In the forest of Selwood the project was disclosed to some of the more powerful thanes, whose approbation appeared to insure its success. But at the return of Ethelwulf the tide of popularity flowed in his favour; the majority of the nation condemned the treason of an unnatural son, and a civil war would have been the consequence, had not the moderation of the king consented to a partition of his dominions. He resigned to Ethelbald the kingdom of Wessex, and contented himself with the provinces which Athelstan, who died in 853, had governed with the title of king. He survived this compromise but two years, which he spent in acts of charity and exercises of devotion. By his will, which was confirmed in a general assembly of the thanes, he left that share of the kingdom still in his possession to his second son Ethelbert; and, dividing his landed property into two portions, bequeathed the larger to his other sons, Ethelbald, Ethelred, and Alfred, and the smaller to his daughter and more distant relatives; but with this difference, that the former was to be held jointly by the three brothers, and to become ultimately the property of the survivor. Both portions he charged with the obligation of maintaining one poor person on every ten hides of land, and of paying a yearly rent of three hundred mancuses to the pope for the use of that prelate, and the service of the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul. He died in 857, and was buried at Winchester.¹

ETHELBALD.

After the death of Ethelwulf, Ethelbald continued to sit on the throne of Wessex: Ethelbert, in pursuance of his father's will, assumed the government of Kent, Essex, Sussex, and Surrey. The new king had been the foremost to condemn the marriage of Ethelwulf with the daughter of the French monarch: he now forgot his former enmity to the princess, and took the young widow to his own bed. This incestuous connection scandalized the people of Wessex: their disapprobation was publicly and loudly expressed; and the king, overawed by the remonstrances of the bishop of Winchester, consented to a separation.²

Judith (I may here be allowed to pursue her history), unwilling to remain in a country which had witnessed her disgrace, sold her lands, the dower she had received from Ethelwulf, and returned to the court of her father. Charles, who dared not trust the discretion of his daughter, ordered her to be confined within the walls of Senlis, but to be treated at the same time with the respect due to a queen. The cunning of Judith was, however, more than a match for the vigilance of her guards. By the connivance of her brother she eloped in disguise with Baldwin, great forester of France; and the fugitives were soon beyond the reach of royal resentment.

The king prevailed on his bishops to excommunicate Baldwin, for having forcibly carried off a widow; but the pope disapproved of the sentence: and at his entreaty Charles gave a reluctant consent to their marriage, though neither he nor Archbishop Hincmar could be induced to assist at the ceremony. They lived in great magnificence in Flanders, the earldom of which was bestowed on them by the king, and from their union descended Matilda, the wife of original, published by Manning, and afterwards by Cardale, and in the Cod. Dipl. 11, 112. ² Asser, 13.

¹ Asser, 9, 12, 13. Testament. Alfred, ibid. 79; which, however, should be corrected by the copy of the Anglo-Saxon

William the Conqueror, who gave to England a long race of sovereigns.¹

In the battles which were fought during the life of Ethelwulf, Ethelbald had acquired peculiar distinction. During his own reign, either he possessed no opportunity of displaying his courage, or the memory of his exploits has been obliterated. Yet his martial character so endeared him to the youth of Wessex, that they lamented his death as a national calamity, and foretold that England would soon feel how severe a loss she had sustained. He died in 860.

ETHELBERT.

According to some writers, the crown of Wessex, agreeably to the provisions contained in the testament of Ethelwulf, ought, on the demise of the last king, to have descended to Ethelred, the third of the brothers. But Ethelbert, who had hitherto possessed the kingdom of Kent, advanced the claim of seniority, and his pretensions were admitted by the great council of Wessex. His martial virtues are said to have been equal to those of his late brother: and the title of "invincible conqueror" was accorded to him by the admiration or flattery of his contemporaries. Yet the meagre chronicles of the times contain no record of his victories; and we are only told that his reign was short, and that he died in 865.

Under this prince the city of Winchester was sacked by the Northmen, who, as they conveyed the plunder to Southampton, were defeated with great slaughter by the ealdormen of Hampshire and Berkshire. Another army landed in the Isle of Thanet, and sold to the men of Kent their forbearance for a considerable sum of money. But they laughed at the credulity of the purchasers; and the eastern moiety of the province was pillaged and depopulated by the faithless barbarians.²

It was also during his reign that an event occurred in the north, which endangered by its consequences the very existence of the Saxons as a nation. Among the sea-kings, one of the most adventurous and successful was Ragnar Lodbrog. On the shores of the Baltic, in the Orkneys, and the Hebrides, in Ireland, Scotland, and Northumbria, he had diffused the terror of his name. In France the intrepid pirate had conducted his fleet up the Seine, spread the flames of devastation on each side of its banks, and taken possession of the city of Paris, which was redeemed from destruction by the payment of seven thousand pounds of silver. By his orders ships of a larger size than had hitherto been navigated by his countrymen were constructed for an invasion of England: but, whether it was owing to the violence of the weather, or the unskillfulness of the mariners, they were wrecked on the coast of Northumbria. Ragnar with several of his followers reached the shore, and heedless of the consequences, commenced the usual career of depredation. Though the Northumbrians had cast off the yoke imposed on them by Egbert, their country was torn by civil dissensions and at this very moment, their chieftains were divided by the opposite pretensions of two competitors, Osbert and Aella. At the first news of the descent of the Northmen, the latter flew to the coast, fought with the plunderers, made Ragnar prisoner, and immediately put him to death.

¹ Apud Bouquet, viii. Annal. Bertin. 77, 78, 83. Ep. Hinc. ad Nic. Pap. 214. Chron. Sith. 268. Capitul. Car. Cal. 650.

² Asser, 14, 15. Chron. Sax. 78. Rudborn (Ang. Sac. i. 206) postpones the capture of Winchester to the first year of Ethelred; and adds, that every monk belonging to the cathedral was slain by the infidels. The Annales Wintonienses place this event in 873.—Ibid., note.

He is said to have been devoured by snakes, and to have consoled his last moments with the hope, that "the cubs of the boar" would avenge his fate.¹ Nor was he disappointed. His sons, who were in Denmark, swore to punish the murderer; the relations, the friends, and the admirers of the deceased chieftain crowded to their standard; and eight sea-kings, with twenty jarls, combined their forces, in the pursuit of revenge and plunder.²

ETHELRED.

By the death of Ethelbert, the crown of Wessex had devolved on Ethelred, the third of the sons of Ethelwulf. About the same time the northern armament, conveying several thousand warriors, under the command of Ingvar and Ubbo,³ two of the sons of Ragnar, reached the coast of East Anglia. They landed without opposition; but finding their number unequal to the enterprise which they had undertaken, they fortified their camp, and patiently waited the arrival of reinforcements from the Baltic. The depth of winter was spent in procuring horses for the army, and in debauching the fidelity of some among the Northumbrian chieftains. In February they abandoned East Anglia, and by the first of March were in possession of York. Alarmed for their country, Osbert and Ælla postponed the decision of their private quarrel, and united their forces against the common enemy. On the twenty-first of March they surprised the Danes in the neighbourhood of York, drove them into the city, and made a breach in the walls. They had penetrated into the streets, when despair redoubled the efforts of the Northmen, and the assailants were in their turn compelled to retire. Osbert, with the bravest of the Northumbrians, was slain; Ælla had the misfortune to fall alive into the hands of his enemies, and Ingvar and Ubbo enjoyed the exquisite delight of torturing the man who had slain their father. His ribs were divided from the spine; his lungs were drawn through the opening, and salt was thrown into the wounds. This victory gave the Danes an undisputed possession of the country south of the Tyne; the natives on the north of that river solicited the friendship of the invaders, and, with their consent, conferred the sovereign power on a chieftain called Egbert.⁴

The army of the barbarians now divided itself into two bodies. The smaller remained at York to cultivate the country; the more numerous marched to the south, and took possession of Nottingham. Burhred, king of Mercia, immediately solicited the assistance of Ethelred, who, with his brother Alfred and the forces of Wessex, joined the Mercian army. The enemy prudently confined themselves within the walls of the town, and the besiegers were unable to force them to a battle. At length Nottingham was surrendered by capitulation, and the Danes retired without molestation to their countrymen at York.⁵

¹ Saxo Gram. p. 176. Søræ, 1654. Pet. Olaus, apud Langebeck, p. 111. Hafnæ, 1772.

² Ragnar's death was known to the English chroniclers; but they were ignorant of the reason which induced his sons to attempt the conquest of the island. The industry of Mr. Turner has discovered the real cause in the northern historians.—Turner, ii. 107, 118.

³ Tel. Coll. i. 220.

⁴ Asser, 17, 18. Chron. Sax. 79. Saxo

Gram. 177. Pet. Olaus, 111. Sim. Dun. 14. The punishment inflicted on Ælla was usual among the Northmen, and was called "at rista ðrn," from the supposed resemblance of the victim to the figure of an eagle. The operation was generally performed by the chief himself. It is thus described by Snorre:—Ad speciem aquilæ dorsum ita ei laniabat, ut adacto ad spinam gladio, costisque omnibus ad lumbos usque a tergo divisiss, pulmones extraheret.—Snorre, p. 108.

⁵ Asser, 19, 20. Chron. Sax. 79. Ingul. 18.

The next expedition of the Northmen led them across the Humber into Lincolnshire. They landed at Lindesey, burnt the rich monastery of Bardeney, and put its inhabitants to the sword. The summer months were devoted to the pursuit of plunder; in September they passed the Witham, and entered the district of Kesteven. To oppose their progress, the ealdorman Algar had collected the youth of the neighbourhood. In the first attempt he repulsed their advanced guard, and killed three of their kings. On the following morning his little army was surrounded by all the forces of the invaders. The advantage of the ground enabled the Saxons to protract the contest till the evening; at last they were broken by an artifice of the enemy, and slaughtered without mercy. The victors continued their march during the silence of the night, but their route was illumined by repeated conflagrations. As the flames approached the monastery of Croyland, the younger monks escaped in their boats across the lake, the more aged, with the boys, retired to the church. Oskytul, a Danish chieftain, soon forced the gates; the abbot was beheaded on the steps of the altar, and his companions, with the exception of one boy, were massacred in different apartments of the abbey. Having pillaged and burnt the monastery, they directed their march to Medeshamstede. An attempt was made by the inhabitants of the neighbourhood to defend the walls, and in the first assault one of the sons of Ragnar received a severe wound. But in the second the fury of the Danes burst open the gates; the women and children, who had sought refuge within the abbey, were massacred, and Ubbo avenged the wound of his brother by slaughtering, with his own hand, the abbot and eighty-four monks. From the ashes of Medeshamstede they proceeded to Huntingdon, and from the destruction of that place to the Isle of Ely. The nuns of this monastery, who were descended from the noblest of the Saxon families, were sacrificed to their lust and cruelty; the treasures of the country, which had been deposited in the island, were divided among the barbarians, and the edifice, with every other building within the range of their devastation, was devoured by the flames.¹

It will excite surprise that the Saxon princes should remain idle spectators of the progress of the Danes, instead of uniting their forces for the defence of their common country. They appear to have conceived that the fury of the torrent would, as it rolled on, gradually subside. The king of Mercia had seen one of his most opulent provinces for six months in their possession, and yet, under the pretence of opposing the Britons in the west, had not made a single effort for its deliverance. From Mercia the invaders entered the country of the East Angles. They had already burnt Thetford, when Ulfsketul, the ealdorman, retarded their advance for a few days. But Edmund, the king, conscious of his inability to contend against superior numbers, and afraid of inflaming their resentment by a fruitless resistance, disbanded his forces, and retired towards his castle of Framlingham.² He was intercepted at Hoxon, on the Waveney, and conducted in chains to the quarters of Ingvar. The proposals of the sea-king were rejected by the captive as repugnant to his honour and religion. To extort his compliance, he was bound naked to a tree, and lacerated

¹ Asser, 20. Ingul. 19, 24.

² In Leland's Collectanea (i. 222), we are told that Edmund fought a great battle with the Danes in which he lost most of his men.

with whips; some of the spectators, with cruel dexterity, shot their arrows into his arms and legs; and the Dane, wearied out by his constancy, ordered his head to be struck off. Edmund was revered as a martyr by his subjects and their posterity.¹

The winter was spent by the Northmen in regulating the fate of the East Angles, and in arranging plans of future conquest. From Thetford, the general rendezvous, Ingvar returned to his former associates in Northumbria.² Gothrun assumed the sceptre of East Anglia, which, from that period, became a Danish kingdom, and Halfdene and Baceg, leading the more adventurous of the invaders into Wessex, surprised the town of Reading. They fortified the place, and, to strengthen their position, began on the third day to open a trench from the Thames to the Kennet; but the ealdorman Ethelwulf attacked them at Englefield, killed one of their commanders, and drove the workmen into the camp. Four days later Ethelred and his brother Alfred arrived with the army of Wessex. The parties, which the pursuit of plunder had led to a distance, were easily put to flight; but in an attempt to storm the Danish intrenchments, the Saxons experienced a loss, which taught them to respect the skill as well as the valour of the invaders. Ethelred, however, sensible that his crown was at stake, reinforced his army, and, before the end of the week, met the enemy at Escesdune.³ The night was spent on each side in preparation for the combat; the morning discovered the Danes assembled in two divisions on different parts of an eminence. Ethelred ordered the Saxons to adopt a similar arrangement, and retired to his tent to assist at mass.⁴ The impatience of Alfred condemned the piety of his brother, and ordering his men to cover their heads with their shields, he boldly led them up the declivity, and attacked one of the hostile divisions. Ethelred followed quickly with the remainder of the army, and the Northmen, after a most obstinate resistance, were routed, and pursued in confusion as far as Reading. Among the slain were Baceg, one of their kings, and the jarls Osbern, Frearn, Harold, and the two Sidrocs. A solitary thorn-tree pointed out to posterity the spot on which the Danes were defeated.⁵

Within a fortnight after the last sanguinary conflict, another was fought at Basing, in which the invaders took an ample revenge. Their numbers were soon after increased by the arrival of another armament from the Baltic, and a most obstinate battle ensued at Morton, in Berkshire. The Saxon chroniclers give the advantage to their countrymen, but acknowledged that the Danes remained in possession of the field. Ethelred, who had been wounded, survived only a few days. He died on the 23rd of March, and was buried at Winborne; where his memory was afterwards honoured as that of a martyr.⁶

¹ Asser, 20. Ing. 24. Abbo. Floriac. in Act. Sanct. West. ad ann. 870.

² He afterwards invaded Ireland, and died there.—Annal. Ulton. 65.

³ Escesdune has been sought in different places by different writers. As the Saxon Chronicle (p. 135) says that it lay in the road from Wallingford to Cuckhamsley Hill, Gibson was probably right when he fixed it at Aston.

⁴ It has been said that Ethelred was "impressed with a dispiriting belief that he should not survive the battle" (Turner, vol. ii. p. 154): but the words of Asser have a very different meaning. Athmāns se inde (e tentorio) vivum non discessurum, antequam sacerdos missam finiret, et divinum pro humano nolle deserere servitium.—Asser, 22.

⁵ Asser, 24. Chron. Sax. 81.

⁶ Asser, 21—24.

CHAPTER IV.

ANGLO-SAXONS.—A.D. 871.

BIRTH, EDUCATION, AND ACCESSION OF ALFRED—SUCCESSSES OF THE DANES—ALFRED OPPOSES THEM BY SEA—HIS VICTORIES, LAWS, AND IMPROVEMENTS—REIGNS OF EDWARD—ÆTHELSTAN—EDMUND—AND EDRED.

ALFRED THE GREAT.

WITH the name of Alfred, posterity has associated the epithet of "the great." The kings, his predecessors, are chiefly known to us by their actions in the field of battle: it is the praise of Alfred that he was not only a warrior, but also the patron of the arts, and the legislator of his people. Their history has been compressed into a few pages: but his merit will deserve a more full and detailed narration.

Alfred was born at Wantage in 849, the youngest of the four sons whom Osburga, the daughter of Oslac, bore to Æthelwulf. The beauty, vivacity, and playfulness of the boy endeared him to his parents, who affected to foresee that he would one day prove the chief ornament of the race of Cerdic. It was this partiality which induced the king to send him, when only in his fifth year, with a numerous retinue to Rome, to be crowned by the pontiff; and afterwards, when the royal pilgrim himself visited the apostolic city, Alfred was selected to accompany his father.

The Anglo-Saxons of this period had degenerated from the literary reputation of their ancestors. The thanes, dividing the time between their occupations of war and the pleasures of the chase, despised the tranquil pursuits of knowledge, and directed the attention of their children to those exercises which impart habits of strength, agility, and courage. Osburga, however, had the merit of awakening in the mind of Alfred that passion for learning, by which he was so honourably distinguished from his contemporaries. Holding in her hand a Saxon poem elegantly written, and beautifully illuminated, she offered it as a reward to the first of her children whose proficiency should enable him to read it. The emulation of Alfred was excited: he ran to his master, applied to the task with diligence, performed it to the satisfaction of the queen, and received the prize of his industry.¹

But soon, by the death of both parents, the education of the young prince devolved on his elder brothers, to whom the pursuits of literature were probably objects of contempt. His proficiency under their care was limited to the art of reading: from which he could derive no other immediate advantage than the perusal of a few Saxon poems, and books of devotion, written in the vernacular idiom. It proved, however, to him an acquisition of considerable importance: for it laid the foundation of his subsequent improvement; it urged his curiosity to explore those treasures of history and science, which were locked up in venatoria et cæteris artibus, quæ nobilibus conveniunt (p. 43).

¹ Asser, 16. The same writer carefully distinguishes the liberales artes from the

the obscurity of a learned language; and it enabled him at a later period to apply with success to the study of the Latin tongue. But his health was then impaired by disease, his mind occupied with the cares of government: and in the company of his friends he often lamented that indulgence, which had permitted him to throw away the years of his youth in pursuits and diversions, from which he had reaped nothing but ignorance and regret.¹

But if the mind of Alfred had not received the polish of classical literature, it had been deeply impressed with religious sentiments, which influenced his conduct through life. At the age of twenty he determined through motives of virtue to marry. The lady, whom he honoured with his choice, was Alswitha, the daughter of Ethelred, a Mercian caldorman, and of Eadburga, a princess of the race of Penda. But the joy of the nuptial ceremony was clouded by an unexpected calamity. In the midst of the festivity, while Alfred was entertaining the thanes of both kingdoms, he was suddenly seized with a most painful disorder. Its seat was internal: its origin and nature baffled all the science and skill of the Saxon physicians. By the ignorance of the people it was attributed to magic, or to the malice of the devil, or to a new and unknown species of fever. From that moment to the day in which Asser wrote his history, during the long lapse of five-and-twenty years, the king was afflicted with this mysterious disease: its attacks were almost incessant; and each short interval of ease was embittered by the prospect of a speedy return of pain. It continued to harass him till his death.²

During the reigns of his brothers, he possessed the government of a petty district, with the title of king. At the death of Ethelred he was called to the throne by the unanimous voice of the West Saxons. With real or affected modesty he refused; alleging his own incapacity, and the increasing multitudes of the Danes. His objections were overruled; the archbishop of Canterbury placed the crown on his head; and at the name of Alfred the hopes of the West Saxons revived. The first care of the young monarch (he was only in his twenty-second year) was to perform with decent pomp the funeral of his late brother; and from this solemn ceremony he was summoned to arms and the field of battle. Another body of adventurers had joined the invaders stationed at Reading. The confederates penetrated into Wiltshire, and from their camp on the hills which cover the banks of the Willy, spread devastation over the surrounding country. Anxious to distinguish himself, the new king, at the head of his West Saxons, advanced to seek a more numerous enemy. The impetuosity of the attack threw the Northmen into disorder: but they rallied from their flight, renewed the contest, and rather by superior numbers than superior valour, wrested the victory from the grasp of their opponents. The unfortunate issue of this battle gave a new direction to the policy of Alfred. He negotiated with the Danish chieftains, and induced them, probably by the offer of a valuable present, to withdraw out of his dominions.³

From Wiltshire Halfdene led his barbarians to London, where he passed the winter. Burhred, the king of Mercia, taught by the example of Alfred, made them a liberal donative, and obtained a promise that they would march peaceably through his territories on their road to the north:

¹ Asser, 17.

² Id. 19, 40—42.

³ Asser, 24, 25. Chron. Sax. 82.

but they halted at Torksey, in Lincolnshire, and returned to their usual habits of depredation. Another present, and another treaty succeeded. The Danes derided the simplicity of the Mercian, and, on a sudden, without pretext or provocation, surprised Repton, on the southern bank of the Trent. This monastery, the pride of Mercian piety, they burnt to the ground; and violated the tombs of the princes whose ashes reposed within it. The following spring their numbers were doubled by the arrival of another horde of adventurers, under the united command of the kings Gothrun, Oskytul, and Amund. His knowledge of their force, joined to his experience of their perfidy, drove the Mercian king to despair. Unable to repel them by force, or to purchase their removal by money, he abandoned his throne, and proceeded, a reluctant pilgrim, to the tombs of the apostles at Rome. He arrived with a broken heart, died within a few days, and was buried in the church of the Saxon hospital. His queen Ethelswitha followed her lord, but had not even the consolation of visiting his grave. She sickened and died at Ticino.¹

By the retreat of Burhred, the Mercian sceptre was left at the disposal of the invaders. They placed it in the hands of Ceolwulf, a native thane, who had the pusillanimity to accept it from the enemies of his country, on the ignominious condition of paying them a yearly tribute, and of reigning in subservience to their will. This phantom of a king was but the pander to their rapacity. As long as he could extort money from his miserable countrymen, he was permitted to retain the sceptre: when he could no longer satisfy their demands, he was stripped of the ensigns of royalty, and suffered from their cruelty that death, which he owed to his country. He was the last who bore the title of king of Mercia.²

The whole of the Anglo-Saxon territories were now under the dominion of the invaders, with the exception of the districts on the south of the Thames and the north of the Tyne. In 875, having arranged the plan of their future operations, they divided themselves into two bodies. The new adventurers with their three kings moved towards the south, and occupied Cambridge: Halfdene and his followers embarked on board their fleet in the Trent, steered along the coast of Deira, entered the Tyne, and ascended that river as far as the mouth of the Tame. Here they moored their fleet during the winter. Upon the first appearance of spring they issued forth to the work of devastation. Tyne-mouth was levelled with the ground. The abbey of Lindisfarne was plundered and reduced to ashes; while the bishop and monks precipitately fled with their treasures and the body of St. Cuthbert to the highest of the Northumbrian mountains. At Coltingham the nuns, stimulated by the example of their abbess, disfigured their faces with wounds to escape the insults of the barbarians. They preserved their chastity; but perished in the flames which devoured their convent. Wherever Halfdene marched, his route might be traced by the smoking ruins of towns and villages, and the mangled remains of the victims of his barbarity. The summer he spent in ravaging the lands of the Strathclyde Britons, the Scots, and the Picts: in the autumn he returned into Bernicia, and, dividing it among his followers, exhorted them to cultivate by their industry that soil, which they had won by their valour.³

¹ Asser, 26. Ingul. 26, 27.

² Asser, 26, 27. Ingul. 27. Chron. Sax. 82, 83.

³ Asser, p. 27. Chron. Sax. p. 83. Sim. Dunel. p. 95. Mat. West. ad ann. 870.

While Halfdene was thus consolidating his conquests in Northumbria, Gothrun with the southern army remained inactive for the space of twelve months in the neighbourhood of Cambridge. But one night the barbarians suddenly hastened to their fleet, embarked, and disappeared. Soon afterwards they were descried, steering towards the coast of Dorset, where they surprised the strong castle and monastery of Wareham, situated at the conflux of the Frome and the Piddle. From this station plundering parties were despatched in every direction, which, on the arrival of Alfred, retired within their intrenchments. In the art of besieging places the Saxons seem to have been conscious of their deficiency. They never refused to meet the enemy in the field; but from the day on which Ethelred was defeated before Reading, prudence had taught them to respect the Danish fortifications. Alfred attempted to negotiate; and Gothrun consented, for a considerable sum, to retire out of Wessex. Instructed, however, by the fate of Burhred, and not confiding in the sincerity of the Dane, the king demanded a certain number of hostages, and was permitted to select them from the noblest of the chieftains. He next required their oaths. They swore by their bracelets, which were sacred to Odin. He was not content. They swore by the relics of the Christian saints. Satisfied that he had bound them by every tie which his diffidence could devise, Alfred now expected their departure; when, in the darkness of the night, a detachment of the army sallied from the castle, surprised the Saxon cavalry, mounted the horses of the slain, and by a rapid march took possession of Exeter. The king, unable to dislodge them from either position, retired with shame and disappointment.¹

In the fifth century the Saxons had been formidable for their power by sea; their conquests in Britain had directed their attention to other objects, and had annihilated their fleet. But Alfred now saw the necessity of opposing the Danes on their own element. In 875 he equipped a few ships, manned them with foreign adventurers, whom the hope of reward had allured to his service, and, trusting himself to the faith of these mercenaries, sailed in quest of an enemy. Fortune threw in his way a Danish fleet of seven ships, one of which he captured, while the others escaped. This trifling success elevated his hopes; ships and galleys were built, and by unceasing efforts, he at last succeeded in creating a navy. He had soon reason to congratulate himself on this acquisition. A resolution had been taken by the Northmen to evacuate Wareham. Their cavalry proceeded to join their friends at Exeter, and were followed by Alfred, who invested the place by land; the infantry embarked on board the fleet, and were directed to steer to the same city. But they had scarcely put to sea, before a storm compelled them to run along the coast of Hampshire, where they lost one-half of their ships. The others, shattered by the tempest, recovered their course, but were opposed by the Saxon fleet, which blockaded the mouth of the Ex, and after a sharp action were entirely destroyed. The loss of one hundred and twenty sail induced Gothrun to treat in earnest. More hostages were given, the former oaths were renewed, and the Northmen marched from Exeter into Mercia.²

It has been said that the character of Alfred was without a blemish. Such unqualified praise is the language of rhetorical declamation, rather than of historical truth. In his early years, indeed, his opening virtues endeared him to the nation;¹ and in a more advanced age he was the guardian and the benefactor of his country. But at the commencement of his reign there was much in his conduct to reprehend. The young monarch seems to have considered his high dignity as an emancipation from restraint; and to have found leisure, even amidst his struggles with the Danes, to indulge the impetuosity of his passions. The scandal of Wallingford may be dismissed with the contempt which it perhaps deserves;² but we learn from more ancient authorities that his immorality and despotism provoked the censure of his virtuous kinsman St. Neot;³ and Asser, his friend and panegyrist, acknowledges, that he was haughty to his subjects, neglected the administration of justice, and treated with contempt the complaints of the indigent and oppressed. It was to this indiscretion (to borrow the term under which the partiality of the biographer was willing to veil the misconduct of his patron),⁴ that Alfred himself attributed the severe and unexpected calamity, which overwhelmed him in the eighth year of his reign: for the piety of the age, instead of tracing events to their political sources, referred them immediately to the providence of God; and considered misfortune as the instrument with which divine justice punished past enormities.

¹ Asser, p. 27, 28. Chron. Sax. p. 63.

² Asser, p. 29. Chron. Sax. p. 64.

At the close of the last campaign we left him in the undisturbed possession of the kingdom of Wessex; at the beginning of the next year we discover him a solitary fugitive, lurking in the morasses of Somersetshire. This sudden revolution arose from the policy of Gothrun, the most artful of the Northmen. That chieftain, on his retreat out of Wessex, had fixed his residence at Gloucester, and rewarded the services of his veterans by dividing among them the lands in the neighbourhood. But while this peaceful occupation seemed to absorb his attention, his mind was actively employed in arranging a plan of warfare, which threatened to extinguish the last of the Saxon governments in Britain. A winter campaign had hitherto been unknown in the annals of Danish devastation; after their summer expeditions the invaders had always devoted the succeeding months to festivity and repose, and it is probable that the followers of Gothrun were as ignorant as the Saxons of the real design of their leader. On the first day of the year 878 they received an unexpected summons to meet him on horseback at an appointed place; on the night of the 6th of January they were in possession of Chippenham, a royal villa on the left bank of the Avon. There is reason to believe that Alfred was in the place, when the alarm was given; it is certain that he could not be at any great distance. From Chippenham, Gothrun dispersed his cavalry in different directions over the neighbouring counties; the Saxons were surprised by the enemy before they had heard of the war; and the king saw himself surrounded by the barbarians, without horses and almost without attendants. At first he conceived the rash design of rushing on the multitude of his enemies; but his temerity was restrained by the more considerate suggestions of his friends; and he consented to reserve himself for a studio subdere festinavit.—Walling. p. 535.

¹ Asser, p. 24. He adds that Alfred, had he been ambitious, might have obtained the crown from the favour of the people, to the exclusion of his elder brother.

² In primordiis regni sui vivebat luxuriis et vitis subjugatus—virgines et caste vivere volentes vel invitas vel voluntarias omni

³ Prævos redarguens actus jussit in melius converti.—De tyrannidis improbitate, ac de superba regiminis austeritate acriter eum increpavit.—Vit. St. Neoti, in Act. SS. Ben. sæc. iv. tom. ii. p. 330, 331.

⁴ Asser, p. 31, 32.

less dangerous and more hopeful experiment. To elude suspicion, he dismissed the few thanes who were still near his person, and endeavoured alone, and on foot, to gain the centre of Somersetshire. There he found a secure retreat in a small island, situated in a morass formed by the conflux of the Thone and the Parret, which was afterwards distinguished by the name of Ethelingey, or Prince's Island.¹

Though the escape of Alfred had disappointed the hopes of the Danes, they followed up their success with indefatigable activity. The men of Hampshire, Dorset, Wilts, and Berkshire, separated from each other, ignorant of the fate of their prince, and unprepared for any rational system of defence, saw themselves compelled to crouch beneath the storm. Those who dwelt near the coast, crossed with their families and treasure to the opposite shores of Gaul; the others sought to mitigate by submission the ferocity of the invaders, and by the surrender of a part, to preserve the remainder of their property. One county alone, that of Somerset, is said to have continued faithful to the fortunes of Alfred; and yet, even in the county of Somerset, he was compelled to conceal himself at Ethelingey, while the ealdorman Æthelnoth with a few adherents wandered in the woods. By degrees the secret of the royal retreat was revealed: he was joined by the more trusty of his subjects; and in their company he occasionally issued from his concealment, intercepted the straggling parties of the Danes, and returned, loaded with the spoils, often of the enemy, sometimes (such was his hard necessity) of his own people. As his associates multiplied, these excursions were more frequent and successful; and at Easter, to facilitate the access to the island, he ordered a communication to be made with the land by a wooden bridge, of which he secured the entrance by the erection of a fort.

While the attention of Alfred was thus fixed on the enemy who had seized the eastern provinces of his kingdom, he was unconscious of the storm which threatened to burst on him from the west. Another of the sons of Ragnar, probably the sanguinary Ubbo, with three-and-twenty sail, had lately ravaged the shores of Demetia, or South Wales; and crossing to the northern coast of Devonshire, had landed his troops in the sævitiā cominus irruisse, suorumque considerans dispositionem (dispersionem, MS. Claud. A. 5, p. 157), huc illucque cœpit animo fluctuare: tandem discretiore fretus arbitrio, cessit hostibus, ac solus et inermis fugæ est expositus ludibrio.—Vit. St. Neot. in Act. SS. Ben. sæc. iv. tom. ii. p. 333. This author proceeds to notice one of the adventures which Alfred, it is said, delighted to narrate to the circle of his friends. (Malm. de Reg. 23.) In his retreat he was entertained in the cottage of a swineherd; and his hostess, in the absence of her husband, desired the stranger to watch the loaves which she was baking on the hearth. But Alfred's mind was too deeply occupied with the thought of his misfortunes to attend to the charge. The bread was burnt; and the negligence of the king was severely chastised by the tongue of the woman. This incident was soon sung in Latin verse:—

¹ To account for the sudden retreat of Alfred, and the temporary extinction of the West-Saxon power, has perplexed most historians. I shall not enumerate their different hypotheses, as the account given in the text satisfactorily, in my opinion, explains the whole difficulty; and is supported by authorities which seem to have been overlooked. "DCCLXXVIII. This year in mid-winter, over Twelfth-night, the Danish army stole to Chippenham, and rode over the West-Saxon land, and settled in it. And much of the people they drove over sea, and of the rest the greater part they rode round, and subjected to themselves, except the king Alfred, and he with a little band, went uneasily to the woods and the fastnesses of the moors."—Chron. Sax. 84. Their success was owing to their celerity, obsequitando, Ethelw. i. 480.—Iter accelerans occidentales Anglicos attentavit invadere. In illis enim partibus dixerat a fugitivis ipsum regem hiemare. Rex autem Aluredus audiens barbaricam rabiem et

Urere quos cernis panes, gyrate moraris, Cum inimum gaudes hos manducare calentes.—Asser, p. 31.

vicinity of Aplemore. It appears as if the two brothers had previously agreed to crush the king between the pressure of their respective armies. Alarmed at this new debarkation, Odun the ealdorman, with several thanes, fled for security to the castle of Kynwith. It had no other fortification than a loose wall erected after the manner of the Britons: but its position on the summit of a lofty rock rendered it impregnable. The Danish leader was too wary to hazard an assault; and calmly pitched his tent at the foot of the mountain, in the confident expectation that the want of water would force the garrison to surrender. But Odun, gathering courage from despair, silently left his intrenchments at the dawn of morning; burst into the enemy's camp; slew the Danish chief with twelve hundred of his followers; and drove the remainder to their fleet. The bravery of the Saxons was rewarded with the plunder of Wales; and among the trophies of their victory was the Reafan, the mysterious standard of the raven, woven in one noon-tide by the hands of the three daughters of Ragnar. The superstition of the Danes was accustomed to observe the bird, as they marched to battle. If it appeared to flap its wings, it was a sure omen of victory: if it hung motionless in the air, they anticipated nothing but defeat.¹

The news of this success infused courage into the hearts of the most pusillanimous. Alfred watched the reviving spirit of his people, and by trusty messengers invited them to meet him in the seventh week after Easter at the stone of Egbert, in the eastern extremity of Selwood forest.² On the appointed day the men of Hampshire, Wiltshire, and Somerset cheerfully obeyed the summons. At the appearance of Alfred, they hailed the avenger of their country; the wood echoed their acclamations; and every heart beat with the confidence of victory. But the place was too confined to receive the multitudes that hastened to the royal standard; and the next morning the camp was removed to Iglea, a spacious plain, lying on the skirts of the wood, and covered by marshes in its front.³ The day was spent in making preparations for the conflict, and in assigning their places to the volunteers that hourly arrived: at the dawn of the next morning, Alfred marshalled his forces, and occupied the summit of Ethandune, a neighbouring and lofty eminence.⁴ In the mean while Gothrun had not been an idle spectator of the motions of his adversary. He had recalled his scattered detachments, and was advancing with hasty steps to chastise the insolence of the insurgents.⁵ As the armies approached, they vociferated shouts of mutual defiance; and after the first discharge of their missive weapons, rushed to a closer and more sanguinary combat. The shock of the two nations, the

¹ Chron. Sax. 84. Asser, 32.

² It is now called Brixton. Ingulf (p. 26), and some writers after him, inform us that the king disguised himself as a harper, and visited the Danish camp, where he observed their negligence, and learned their ulterior objects. The story is in itself improbable, and was unknown to Asser.

³ It is believed to be Leigh, not far from Westbury. In the Life of St. Neot it is described as grata salicis planities juxta silvam (p. 335).

⁴ Disposita seriatim acie proximum anticipaverunt promontorium. Hinc hostium explorabant occursum.—Ibid. Anticipavit montem hostibus nimis aptum, si præcavisent.—Walling. p. 538. This is probably Brattonhill, near Eddington.

⁵ Gytrus undique Danos convocans, magnam magnam contraxit.—Walling. ibid. Ut rumor hujus eventus latissime diffusus profanas Gytronis attingeret aures—protinus juxta morem suum acies disposerunt, ad locum certaminis castra moventes.—Vit. St. Neot. p. 335. These passages plainly show that the Danes were not surprised by Alfred, as is generally asserted.—See also Translat. St. Cuth. in Act. SS. Bened. sæc. iv. tom. ii. p. 279.

efforts of their leaders, the fluctuations of victory, and the alternate hopes and fears of the contending armies, must be left to the imagination of the reader. The Danes displayed a courage worthy of their former renown, and their repeated conquests. The Saxons were stimulated by every motive that could influence the heart of man. Shame, revenge, the dread of subjugation, and the hope of independence, impelled them forward: their perseverance bore down all opposition; and the Northmen, after a most obstinate but unavailing resistance, fled in crowds to their camp. The pursuit was not less murderous than the engagement: the Saxons immolated to their resentment every fugitive who fell into their hands. Immediately, by the king's orders, lines were drawn round the encampment; and the escape of the survivors was rendered impracticable by the vigilance and the multitude of their enemies. Famine and despair subdued the obstinacy of Gothrun, who on the fourteenth day offered to capitulate. The terms imposed by the conqueror were: that the king and principal chieftains should embrace Christianity; that they should entirely evacuate his dominions; and that they should bind themselves to the fulfilment of the treaty by the surrender of hostages, and by their oaths. After a few weeks, Gothrun with thirty of his officers was baptized at Aulre, near Athelney. He took the surname of Athelstan, and Alfred was his sponsor. After the ceremony both princes removed to Wedmore, where on the eighth day Gothrun put off the white robe and chrysmal fillet, and on the twelfth bade adieu to his adopted father, whose generosity he had now learned to admire as much as he had before respected his valour. From Chippenham he marched into Mercia, fixed his head-quarters at Cirencester, and ordered his followers to cultivate the soil. He remained here but twelve months, when he returned to his former kingdom of East Anglia; and though a Danish armament under the command of Hastings entered the Thames, and solicited him to renew the war, he adhered faithfully to his engagements. Two treaties which he made with Alfred are still extant. By the first the boundaries between the two kingdoms are determined to be the Thames, the river Lee to its source, and a line drawn thence to Bedford, and along the Ouse as far as the Watling-street, and thence probably to the mouth of the river. The lives of Englishmen and Danes are declared to be of equal value: and all unauthorized intercourse between the two nations is forbidden. By the second, the two kings engage to promote Christianity, and to punish apostasy; the laws of the Danes are assimilated to those of the Saxons; and the fines payable for offences are determined both in Saxon and Danish money.¹ The followers of Gothrun gradually adopted the habits of civilized life; and by acquiring an interest in the soil, contributed to protect it from the ravages of subsequent adventurers.

The retreat of Gothrun gave to Wessex a long respite from the horrors of war, and fifteen years of comparative tranquillity left Alfred at leisure to attend to the improvement and civilization of his people. The army claimed his first care. The desultory but incessant attacks of the Danes had demonstrated the necessity of organizing a force, which should be ready to take the field at the first alarm, and to march to any point of the coast that was menaced with an attack; but at the same time the scarcity arising from the frequent suspensions of agricultural labour showed the impolicy of collecting together the great mass of the population. Alfred adopted an improved plan, which, while it was calculated to oppose a formidable force to the descents of the Northmen, secured a sufficient supply of hands for the cultivation of the soil. The defence of the towns and cities was intrusted to the courage and fidelity of the inhabitants, under the direction of the king's Gerefa or reeve; of the rest of the free population, the males were divided into two classes, to each of which was allotted in rotation a regular term of service. They were commanded by the king or the ealdorman of the county; and instead of pay, received from the national stores a proportionate supply of provisions.¹

¹ Leg. Sax. 47, 51. In the original the line of demarcation ends at the Watling-street; but, as the province of East Anglia

had been ceded to Gothrun, Spelman is of opinion that it proceeded thence to the mouth of the river.—Vit. Ælfr. 36.

The utility of fortifications had been sufficiently demonstrated by the example of the Danes, and the successful defence of Kynwith. By the orders of Alfred a survey was made of the coast and navigable rivers, and castles were built in places the best fitted to prevent the landing, or to impede the progress of an enemy. Yet in this undertaking, of which the necessity was so apparent, he had to encounter numerous difficulties, arising from the prejudices and indolence of his people. In many instances the execution of the royal orders was postponed; in others the buildings were abandoned as soon as the foundations had been laid. But occasional descents of the Danes came in aid of the king's authority; those who had lost their property by their negligence, were eager to repair the fault by their industry, and before the close of his reign Alfred had the satisfaction to see more than fifty castles built according to his directions.²

The first attempt which the king made to create a navy has been already mentioned. His success stimulated him to new exertions; and, to acquire knowledge, and to do honour to the naval profession, he often accompanied his squadrons in their expeditions. On one of these occasions he met four sail of Northmen. Two were captured by boarding, and their crews put to the sword; the commanders of the other two, terrified by the fate of their companions and their own loss, threw down their arms, and on their knees solicited mercy. On another occasion the Saxon fleet surprised and captured thirteen sail in the river Stour. Every man on board was massacred; but the same evening the victors in their return were intercepted by a Danish squadron, and completely defeated.³ As soon as the king became acquainted with the arts of attack and the modes of defence practised by the northern nations, several improvements suggested themselves to his superior sagacity. He ordered ships to be built of larger dimensions than those of the Danes. Their decks were higher, and their length double. The increased elevation gave his mariners an advantage over their enemies, who were compelled to direct their strokes upwards; and the greater bulk of the vessels added to their stability in the water, while the Danish ships were agitated by the slightest motion. That their celerity might not be retarded by the additional weight, he augmented the number of the rowers, and gave to all his vessels thirty, to several more than thirty, oars on a side. This fleet was so judiciously disposed in the different harbours, that the ma-

¹ Chron. Sax. p. 92, 93.

² Asser, 69, 60. Spelm. Vit. Alf. p. 129, n.

³ Asser, 36, 37. Chron. Sax. 86, 87.

raiding squadrons of the barbarians found it difficult to approach, or to abandon, the shore with impunity.¹

From measures of defence against a foreign enemy, the king turned his attention to the domestic economy of the country. During the long period of Danish devastation, the fabric of civil government had been nearly dissolved. The courts of judicature had been closed; injuries were inflicted without provocation, and retaliated without mercy, and the Saxon, like the Dane, had imbibed a spirit of insubordination, and a contempt for peace, and justice, and religion. To remedy these evils, Alfred restored, enlarged, and improved the salutary institutions of his forefathers; and from the statutes of Ethelbert, Ina, Offa, and other Saxon princes, composed a code of law, adapted to the circumstances of the time, and the habits of his subjects.² But legislative enactments would have been of little avail, had not the king insured their execution, by an undertaking of no small difficulty, but which by his vigilance and perseverance he ultimately accomplished. The Saxon jurisprudence had established an ample gradation of judicatures, which diverged in different ramifications from the king's court into every hamlet in the kingdom; but of the persons invested with judicial authority very few were qualified for so important an office. Almost all were ignorant; many were despotic. The powerful refused to acquiesce in their decisions, and the defenceless complained of their oppression. Both had frequent recourse to the equity of Alfred, who listened as cheerfully to the complaints of the lowest as of the highest among his subjects. Every appeal was heard by him with the most patient attention; in cases of importance he revised the proceedings at his leisure, and the inferior magistrates trembled at the impartiality and severity of their sovereign. If their fault proceeded from ignorance or inadvertence, they were reprimanded or removed according to the magnitude of the offence; but neither birth, nor friends, nor power, could save the corrupt or malicious judge.³ He was made to suffer the punishment which he had unjustly inflicted, and, if we may believe an ancient authority, forty-four magistrates were by the king's order executed in one year for their informal and iniquitous proceedings.⁴ This severity was productive of the most beneficial consequences. The judges were careful to acquire a competent degree of knowledge; their decisions became accordant to the law; the commission of crime was generally followed by the infliction of punishment; and theft and murder were rendered as rare as they had formerly been prevalent. To prove the reformation of his subjects, Alfred is said to have suspended valuable bracelets on the highway, which no one ventured to remove; and as a confirmation we are told, that if a traveller lost his purse

¹ Chron. Sax. 98.

² Leg. Sax. 28—46.

³ Asser, 69—71.

⁴ Miroir des Justices, p. 296, ed. 1642. It was written by Andrew Horne, under Edward I. or Edward II., and, though of questionable authority, must have been composed from more ancient documents. Some of the cases are curious. Thus Athulf was executed because he had condemned Copping, who was not twenty-one years of age: Billing, because he had condemned Leston, who did not sit down, when proclamation had been made for all but the mur-derer to sit down: Hale, because he had acquitted the sheriff Tristram, though Tristram had unjustly seized goods for the king's use: Therbon, because he had condemned Osgot for a crime, of which he had obtained pardon from the king: Oskitell, because he had condemned Cutting on the sole report of the coroner. Thus also he imprisoned Sithing, because that officer had imprisoned Herbole for a crime committed by Herbole's wife: he ordered Haulf to lose a hand, because he had not inflicted that punishment on Armoc, &c. (p. 296—301).

on the road, he would at the distance of a month find it lying untouched in the same spot.¹ These are probably the fictions of a posterior age; but they serve to show the high estimation in which Alfred's administration of justice was held by our forefathers.

The decline of learning in the Saxon states had been rapidly accelerated by the Danish invasions. The churches and monasteries, the only academies of the age, had been destroyed; and at the accession of Alfred, Wessex could hardly boast of a single scholar able to translate a Latin book into the English tongue.² The king, who from his early years had been animated with the most ardent passion for knowledge, endeavoured to infuse a similar spirit into all who aspired to his favour. For this purpose he invited to his court the most distinguished scholars of his own and of foreign countries. Plegmund and Werfrith, Ethelstan and Werwulf, visited him from Mercia. John of Old Saxony left the monastery of Corbie for an establishment at Ethelingey: Asser of St. David's was induced, by valuable presents, to reside with the king during six months in the year; and an honourable embassy to Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims, returned with Grimbold, the celebrated provost of St. Omer.³ With their assistance Alfred began in his thirty-ninth year to apply to the study of Roman literature; and opened schools in different places for the instruction of his subjects. It was his will that the children of every free man, whose circumstances would allow it, should acquire the elementary arts of reading and writing; and that those who were designed for civil or ecclesiastical employments, should moreover be instructed in the Latin language.⁴

It was a misfortune which the king frequently lamented, that Saxon literature contained no books of science. "I have often wondered," says he, "that the illustrious scholars, who once flourished among the English, and who had read so many foreign works, never thought of transferring the most useful into their own language."⁵ To supply the deficiency Alfred himself undertook the task. Of his translations two were historical, and two didactic. The first were the Ecclesiastical History of the English by Bede, and the Epitome of Orosius, the best abridgment of ancient history then extant, both works calculated to excite and gratify the curiosity of his subjects. Of the others, one was meant for general reading. "The Consolation of Philosophy," by Boetius, a treatise deservedly held in high estimation at that period; and the second was destined for the instruction of the clergy, the Pastoral of Gregory the Great, a work recommended both by its own excellence, and the reputation of its author. Of this he sent a copy to every bishop in his dominions, with a request that it might be preserved in

¹ Malms. de Reg. ii. 4, f. 23.

² Alfred, præf. ad Past. p. 82. Wise's Asser.

³ Asser, 46—49.—Epist. Fulconis in Wise's Asser, p. 123. John, abbot of Ethelingey, has been often confounded with Joannes Scotus Erigena. They were different persons. Scotus, as his name imports, was a native of Ireland; John, the abbot, was a native of Old Saxony. (Asser, 61.) Scotus was neither priest nor monk. (Mabillon, sæc. iv. tom. ii. p. 510.) John the abbot was both priest and monk. (Asser, 47—61. Ælfredi præf. ad Past. p. 85.)

⁴ Ælfred, præf. ad Past. p. 85. Asser, 43—55. Did he not at this time establish the university of Oxford? I know not. The contested passage in Asser (p. 52) appears to me undoubtedly spurious. What writer of the ninth or tenth centuries ever used the expressions, Divus Petrus, or Divi Gildas, Melkinus, &c.

⁵ Ælfred, præf. ad Past. p. 84.

the cathedral for the use of the diocesan clergy.¹

In the arrangement of his time, his finances, and his domestic concerns, Alfred was exact and methodical. The officers of his household were divided into three bodies, which succeeded each other in rotation, and departed at the end of the month, the allotted period of their service.² Of each day he gave one-third to sleep and necessary refreshments: the remainder was divided between the duties of his station, and works of piety and charity.³ His treasurer was ordered to separate his revenue into two moieties. The first he subdivided into three parts, of which one was destined to reward his servants and ministers, another to supply presents for the strangers who visited his court, and the third to pay the numerous bodies of workmen whom he employed. For he erected palaces in different parts of his dominions; repaired and embellished those which had been left by his predecessors, and rebuilt London and several other towns which the Danes had reduced to heaps of ruins. In all these undertakings we are told that he displayed an improved taste and considerable magnificence. Among his artists were numbers of foreigners attracted by his offers, and the fame of his liberality; and by frequent conversation with them he is said to have acquired a theoretical acquaintance with their respective professions, which astonished the most experienced workmen.⁴

The other moiety of his revenue was parcelled out into four portions. One was devoted to the support of his school, his favourite project. Another was given to the two monasteries which he had founded, one at Shaftesbury for nuns, at the head of whom he placed his daughter Ethelgiva; another at Ethelney for monks, which he peopled with foreigners, because the Danish devastations had abolished the monastic institute among his own subjects. The third portion he employed in relieving the necessities of the indigent, to whom he was on all occasions a most bountiful benefactor. From the fourth he drew the alms, which he annually distributed to different churches. They were not confined to his own dominions, but scattered through Wales, Northumbria, Armorica, and Gaul. Often he sent considerable presents to Rome; sometimes to the nations in the Mediterranean and to Jerusalem; on one occasion to the Indian Christians at Meliapour. Swithelm, the bearer of the royal alms, brought back to the king several oriental pearls, and aromatic liquors.⁵

¹ Ælfred, præf. ad Past. p. 86. On each copy was an astell of fifty manuces, and the king requested that no one would "take the astell from the book, nor the book from the minster." The meaning of the word astell has hitherto proved a stumbling-block to the commentators. My notion is, that it was the case containing the book.

² Asser, 66.

³ Malm. 24, 25. Asser, 67. Without the knowledge of chronometers, Alfred was perplexed to discover the true hour of the day. To remedy the inconvenience, he had recourse to the following simple expedient. By repeated experiments he found that a quantity of wax, weighing seventy-two pennies, might be made into six candles, each twelve inches long and of equal thickness, and that these burning in succession, would last exactly twenty-four hours. To prevent the flame from being affected by currents of air, the candles were inclosed in a large lantern of transparent horn; and as the combustion of each inch of wax corresponded with the lapse of one seventy-second part of the day, or twenty of our minutes, he was hence enabled to measure his time with some accuracy.—Asser, 68, 69.

⁴ Asser, 52, 58, 66.

⁵ See Asser, 58, 60, 61, 63, 67. Chron. Sax. p. 86, 90. Malm. de Gest. Reg. 24. Hunt. 201. Flor. Wigor. 591. It is curious that as Asser (p. 58) makes the Mare Tyrrhenum extend "ad ultimum Hyberniam finem," so Alfred in his translation of Orosius says of the same, or the Wendelsæ, that "on hyre west ende is Scotland."

The long interval of peace, which Alfred enjoyed after the baptism of Gothrun, had raised him to a high pre-eminence among the British princes. The East-Anglian and Northumbrian Danes, though their subjection was rather nominal than real, acknowledged his authority. The kingdom of Mercia no longer existed. He had given the government of that country with his daughter Æthelflæd to the ealdorman Æthelred. Even the kings of the Welsh, Anaward of Gwynedd, Hemeid of Demetia, Helised of Brecon, Howel of Gleguising, and Brocmail of Gwent, harassed by intestine dissensions, voluntarily placed themselves under his protection, and did him homage on the same terms as Æthelred of Mercia.¹ It was in this season of prosperity that Alfred saw the storm, which had so long desolated the fairest provinces of Gaul, cross the Channel, and burst on his own territory. Hastings, the most renowned and successful of the sea-kings, after more than forty years of carnage and plunder, undertook, in imitation of Gothrun, to win for himself a kingdom in Britain. The forces of the Northmen assembled in the port of Boulogne in two divisions, of which one, comprising two hundred and fifty sail, steered its course to the mouth of the Limene, and took possession of Apuldre on the Rother;² the other, of eighty ships, under Hastings himself, directing its course more to the north, entered the Swale, and fortified a position at Milton. Never did Alfred display more ability, nor the barbarians more pertinacity, than in the conduct of this war. Every attempt of the invaders was foiled by the foresight and expedition of their adversary; yet they maintained the contest for more than three years; and did not abandon their object till they had exhausted every resource, which courage or perfidy, activity or patience, could supply.

As soon as Alfred collected his forces, he marched into Kent, and occupied a strong position between Milton and Apuldre. From a lofty eminence he could watch the motions of his enemies, whilst his flanks were secured from surprise by an extensive wood on the one side, and a deep morass on the other. Thus the communication between the Northmen was intercepted; and each army was compelled to remain inactive in its camp, or, if it ventured a forward movement, to expose itself to probable destruction. The perfidy of Hastings disengaged him from this embarrassing situation. He offered to depart in consideration of a sum of money; gave hostages for the performance of his engagement; and, as a spontaneous proof of his sincerity, permitted his two sons to receive the sacrament of baptism. To one Alfred, to the other Æthelred, stood sponsors.³ But in the mean time a part of the army at Apuldre eluded the vigilance of the king, stole through the forest of Andredswald, and began to ravage the counties of Wessex. At Farnham they were overtaken by Alfred and his son Edward. The Saxons were victorious; the booty and horses of the barbarians fell into their hands; and many of the fugitives perished, as they attempted to cross the Thames without a knowledge of the fords. In the action their king, whose name is unknown, had received a severe wound; and his inability to bear the rapidity of their flight compelled them

¹ Asser, 49, 50. Now that Mercia was subject to the king of Wessex, we meet with the compound term of Anglo-Saxon—Alfredus Angulsaxonum rex.—Asser, 25.

² There was formerly a river and spacious harbour of this name. Neither is at present in existence, owing to inundations. The spot is now called Romney Marsh.—See Gibson, at the end of Saxon Chronicle, p. 34.

³ Chron. Sax. 94. Hunt. 201. West. 178.

to halt in Thorney, a narrow islet formed by the waters of the Coln. There they were carefully watched by successive parties of Saxons, till they obtained permission to depart on terms similar to those which had been stipulated with Hastings.¹

The open hostility of these adventurers was not more formidable than the suspicious fidelity of their countrymen, who under Gothrun and Cuthred had formerly settled in East Anglia and Northumbria. Both these princes were now dead, and neither hosts nor hostages could secure the obedience of their former retainers. Some time before the evacuation of Thorney, Alfred had received intelligence that these faithless vassals had equipped two powerful fleets, with one of which they were besieging Exeter, while the other ravaged the northern shore of Devon. To add to his perplexity, the perfidy of Hastings was now become manifest. He had indeed abandoned Milton, but it was only to cross the river, and take possession of Beamfleet, on the coast of Essex, where he had been joined by the fleet from Apuldre. In this emergency the king divided his forces. With the cavalry he hastened to Exeter, and drove the besiegers to their ships; Ethered with the remainder surprised Beamfleet in the absence of Hastings, and obtained possession of his treasures, his wife, and his children. This loss humbled the pride of the barbarian; he solicited a pacification; Alfred, in opposition to the advice of his council, ordered the prisoners to be restored; and Hastings promised to leave the island for ever.² Whether he performed his engagement, we are not told; but from this moment he disappears from the pages of the Saxon annalists; and before the close of the century we find him in France, pursuing his usual career of devastation. At last he accepted from Charles the Simple the city and territory of Chartres, and condescended to become the vassal of a throne which he had so often shaken to its foundation.³

However this may be, the adventurers from Apuldre and the fugitives from Thorney took possession of Shobury, on the coast of Essex; and their numbers were increased by the arrival of auxiliaries from East Anglia and Northumbria. On a sudden, leaving a sufficient garrison for the defence of the place, they burst from their cantonments, swept with rapidity the left bank of the Thames, crossed the country to the Severn, and plundered without opposition both sides of that river. At the first alarm the men of Mercia and Wessex, and the Britons of Wales, hastened to oppose the depredators, who at Buttington found themselves surrounded by three armies under Ethered, Athelm, and Ethelnoth. For several weeks they supported with patience the hardships of a siege; but, as soon as their horses were devoured, famine compelled them to make a desperate attempt, and with immense loss they forced a way through their enemies, traversed Mercia, and regained their fortress at Shobury. Here they reposed themselves till their losses were repaired by the arrival of new adventurers; and then, bursting like a torrent through Mercia, they took possession of Chester and the Wirall. Alfred was at the time cruising with his fleet in the Channel. He hastened to the Wirall; but when he had ex-

¹ Chron. Sax. 93. Ethelwerd, 482. This island is generally supposed to be the Morsey, at the mouth of the Coln, in Essex. But Ethelwerd calls it Thorney, and from the situation I should conceive it to have been formed by the river Coln, which enters the Thames near Staines.

² Chron. Sax. 93, 94. Flor. 596.

³ Wil. Gemet. 221, 228. Bouquet, vii. 221, 228.

amined the position of the enemy, he despaired of being able to force their lines, and contented himself with driving away the cattle, and destroying the corn in the neighbourhood. Famine compelled the barbarians to seek new adventures. They ravaged North Wales; but finding the royal army in their way, suddenly returned, directed their march through Northumbria into East Anglia, and by that circuitous route, regained their former station in Essex. It might have been expected that, after so many failures, they would have abandoned the island. Alfred heard with pleasure that they had put to sea with their families and plunder; but in a few days they were discovered in the Thames, near London, and steering their course up the Lea, selected a strong position about twenty miles from that capital, and made it their head-quarters during the winter.¹

In the ensuing spring, the citizens, harassed by the neighbourhood of the Danes, attempted to storm their intrenchments, but were repulsed with considerable slaughter. To protect the harvest, Alfred encamped on the banks of the Lea, and, as he was riding one day, discovered a spot, in which, by diverting the course of the water, and raising obstructions in the bed of the river, it was easy to prevent the egress of the enemy's fleet. The work was soon completed, and for its protection a castle was erected on each bank. The Northmen, foiled by the king's ingenuity, abandoned their position; and, though they were pursued by the Saxon cavalry, reached Quatbridge,² on the Severn. Here they passed the winter without molestation. But their spirit was broken; dissension prevailed among their leaders; and in the spring they disbanded themselves, separating into small bodies, and taking different directions. Many obtained settlements among the East Anglians and Northumbrians, the remainder sailed to their countrymen on the banks of the Seine.³

But though the great body of the barbarians had retired from the contest, several small marauding parties continued to hover round the coast, and often inflicted the most serious injuries on the inhabitants. On one occasion six Danish vessels were seen to enter the strait between the Isle of Wight and the coast of Hampshire; and were quickly pursued by a Saxon squadron of nine sail. The Northmen had divided their force. Three of their ships lay dry on the beach, while the crews were employed in the pursuit of plunder: the other three rode at anchor to receive the attack of the Saxons. In the unequal contest which followed, two of those were captured; the third with only five men on board contrived to escape to a port in East Anglia. The engagement was hardly terminated when the Danes returned from their expedition on shore; and the ebbing of the tide left all the English vessels aground, three near to the enemy, the other six at a considerable distance. This accident awakened the hopes of the barbarians, who fearlessly crossed the sands on foot, and made an attack on the nearest vessels. In this bold though unsuccessful attempt they lost one hundred and twenty men: and yet by their superior skill were the first to get off their ships and put to sea. One of the three escaped: the others were driven on the coast of Sussex, where their crews were seized and executed as pirates. During the summer no fewer than twenty Danish vessels were captured.⁴

The death of Alfred happened on

¹ Chron. Sax. 94—96.

² Quatbridge is probably Quatford, near Bridgenorth.

³ Chron. Sax. 96, 97.

⁴ Chron. Sax. 98, 99.

the 28th of October, in the year 901. He left two sons, Edward, who succeeded him, and Ethelwerd, who received from his father a learned education, and whose sons perished at the celebrated battle of Brunanburh.¹ His daughters were Ethelflæd, married to Ethered of Mercia, Ethelgiva, abbess of Shaftesbury, and Alfritha, wedded to Baldwin, count of Flanders, the son of the celebrated Judith.

The will of Alfred is deserving of notice, from the information which it affords respecting the transmission of property among the Saxons. Egbert had entailed his estates on his male descendants to the exclusion of females: "to the spear-side, and not to the spindle-side." With Ethelwulf's disposition of his lands the reader is already acquainted: but when Ethelbert came to the throne, he prevailed on his brothers Ethelred and Alfred to surrender to him their interest in the joint estate created by Ethelwulf in their favour, on condition that he should reconvey it to them at his death, together with all such lands as he might acquire for himself.² On the accession of Ethelred, it was agreed at first that the king should possess the joint inheritance during his life, and make Alfred his sole heir; but by a second agreement, each party was permitted to make provision for his children out of his personal property, and the lands which he had obtained by particular grants from his father, or by sale or gift or descent from other persons, reserving the residue, together with their joint inheritance, to the survivor.

Alfred, having stated these particulars, informs us, that in order to dispose by will of what belonged to him by the death of Ethelred, he assembled the thanes of Wessex at Langdon. "I prayed them," he adds, "for my love (and gave them security that I would never bear them ill-will for speaking justly), not to be prevented by fear or love from deciding according to right: lest any man should say that I had defrauded my kinsfolks." The thanes approved his title to the property. "It is all," said they, "delivered there into thy hand. Therefore thou mayest bequeath and give it either to a relation or a stranger as thou thinkest best." The next day the king in their presence revoked all his former wills, divided his lands among his two sons, his three daughters, his two nephews, his cousin Osferth, and his wife Alswitha.³ He then left sums of money to all the above, to his caldormen, to his servants, and his bishops: fifty mancuses of gold to fifty priests, fifty to poor clerks or monks, ministers of God, fifty to poor people in distress, and fifty to the church in which he should be buried. At the end he strictly forbade his heirs to invade the liberty of those men whom he had made free. "For God's love, and for the benefit of my soul, I will that they be masters of their own freedom, and of their own will; and in the name of the living God I entreat that no man disturb them by exaction of money or in any other manner: but that they may be left at liberty to serve any lord whom they may choose."

EDWARD.

The succession of Edward was opposed by his cousin Ethelwald, who claimed the crown as the representative of Ethelred, the elder brother of the late monarch. His pretensions were overruled by the decision of the Witenagemot: and the discontented prince, apparently under pretence of recovering the hereditary patrimony of his father, assembled his retainers, and occupied the castles of Christchurch and Winburn. In the latter place he forcibly married a nun out of the convent, and announced his resolution never to surrender the fortress but with his life. The approach of Edward to Badberry suggested a less hazardous policy. He retired in secrecy, and reached the northern Danes, who pitying his misfortunes, or admiring his spirit, gave him the title of king, and hastened to fight under his banner. In a short time the exile saw himself at the head of an army of adventurers from Northumbria, East Anglia, and France.¹ With these he landed in Essex, and obtained possession of that county. The next year he marched through Mercia, crossed the Thames at Cricklade, and pillaged the greater part of Wiltshire. But at the approach of Edward he retired; and the West Saxons in their turn retaliated on the Danes the injuries which they had inflicted on Mercia and Wessex. From St. Edmund's dyke, in Cambridgeshire, they spread the flames of war to the mouth of the Ouse; and crossing that river, continued in the fenny country the work of devastation. At last Edward thought proper to withdraw his army. In defiance of repeated orders, the men of Kent remained behind; they were surrounded by the Danes, and a most murderous conflict ensued. Two ealdormen, several thanes, two abbots, and the greater number of the common men, perished, but the East Anglians purchased their advantage at a high price. They lost their king Eohric; and to Edward the death of Ethelwald was of greater consequence than the most brilliant victory.²

¹ This Ethelwerd, who died in 922 (Flor. 602), has generally been confounded with Ethelwerd the historian, who wrote in the reign of Edward the Martyr, and who says expressly that he was descended not from Alfred, but from Alfred's brother and predecessor Ethered.—Ethelw. præf. 473.

² It appears to me that zemann company refers to their joint tenancy, not joint concurrence.

³ If any of the lands which he left to females had descended to him from Egbert, he desired his heirs male to take the lands, and to give to the females an equivalent in money.

From this period the king's attention was principally directed to two great objects, the union of Mercia with his own dominions, and the subjugation of the Northumbrian and East-Anglian Danes. I. For a few years the government of Mercia, during the frequent infirmities of Ethered, was intrusted to the hands of Ethelfleda, a princess whose masculine virtues and martial exploits are celebrated in the highest strains of panegyric by our ancient historians. At the death of her husband, Edward seized and united to Wessex the two important cities of London and Oxford; nor does Ethelfleda appear to have resented this partition of her territory. She continued to govern the remainder with the title of the Lady of Mercia, and cordially supported her brother in all his operations against the common enemy. But that respect, which Edward had paid to the merit of his sister, he refused to the weakness of his niece Elfwina. When Ethelfleda died in 920, he pretended that the young princess had promised marriage to Reynold the Dane, and entering Mercia at the head of his army, sent her an honourable captive into Wessex, abolished every trace of a separate government, and moulded the whole of the Saxon territories into one undivided kingdom.³

II. Had the Danes in England been united under the same monarch, they would probably have been more than a match for the whole power of Edward; but they still preserved the manners and spirit of their ancestors, and diminished their national strength by dividing it among a number of equal and independent chieftains. After the death of Ethelwald five years elapsed without any important act of hostility; in 910 Edward conducted his forces into Northumbria, and spent five weeks in ravaging the country, and collecting slaves and plunder. The next year the Northmen returned the visit. They penetrated to the Avon, and thence into Gloucestershire; but in their retreat were overtaken by the Saxons, and suffered a defeat, which was long a favourite subject among the national poets. Edward now adopted the plan, which had been so successfully pursued by his father, of building fortresses for the defence of his dominions and the annoyance of the enemy. A line drawn from the mouth of the Thames, through Bedfordshire, to Chester, will pretty accurately describe the boundary which separated the hostile nations. To curb the East Anglians, the king built Witham and Hertford; while Ethelfled, at his suggestion, erected similar fortresses at Bridgenorth, Tamworth, Stafford, Warwick, and other places in the vicinity. Their utility was soon demonstrated in the failure of a Danish expedition from the coast of Armorica. After ravaging the shores of Wales, the barbarians attempted to penetrate into Herefordshire. They were opposed by the inhabitants of the neighbouring burghs, driven into a wood, and compelled to give hostages, as a security for their peaceable departure. Edward was, however, suspicious of their honour, and lined the northern coast of Somersetshire with troops. As he expected, they made two attempts to land in the night at Wachet and at Portlock, and were defeated at both places with considerable slaughter. The survivors fled to one of the uninhabited isles in the mouth of the Severn, but were compelled to abandon their asylum, and seek new adventures in Wales and Ireland.¹

¹ That he had with him adventurers from France is plain from Wendover (i. 368): Transfretavit ad Gallias, ut fortiore rediens milite regem inquietaret.

² Chron. Sax. 100. Hunt. f. 202. West. 180.

³ Chron. Sax. 103, 107. Ingulf, 29. Caradoc, 47.

The royal brother and sister, having thus provided for the security of their own territories, proceeded to attack those of their enemies. Ethelfled took Derby by storm, though the Danes obstinately defended themselves in the streets; and then laid siege to Leicester, which, with the adjacent territory, was subdued by the terror of her arms. Edward, on his side, built two forts at Buckingham to overawe the Northmen of the adjoining counties, took Bedford by capitulation, and advancing into Northamptonshire, fortified Towcester. The Danes, alarmed at the progressive encroachments of the Saxons, made, in the same year, four attempts to obtain possession of the nearest fortresses. One party occupied Tempsford, and besieged Bedford; another stormed the walls of Towcester; a third attacked Wigmore, and a fourth surrounded Malden. In each instance the garrisons defended themselves till the royal army came to their assistance; and Edward, eager to improve his success, took possession of Huntingdon and Colchester. The Danes were dispirited by so many losses; and all their chieftains, from the Willand, in Northamptonshire, to the mouth of the Thames, submitted to the conqueror, took the oaths of allegiance, and acknowledged him for their "lord and protector."²

During the three next years the king with unceasing industry pursued the same line of policy. He successively carried his arms to every part of the ancient boundary of Mercia; erected fortresses at Manchester, at Thelwell, on the left bank of the Mersey, at Nottingham, and at Stamford; and by the severity with which he punished every outbreak, tamed into submission the several bands of barbarians who had settled in the island. By these conquests Edward acquired more real power than had ever been possessed by his predecessors. All the tribes from Northumbria to the Channel formed but one kingdom, subject to his immediate control; while the other nations in the island, warned by the fate of their neighbours, anxiously solicited his friendship. The Danes and Angles of the north made him offers of submission, the kings of the Scots and Strathclyde Britons chose him for their "lord and father;" and the princes of Wales paid him a yearly tribute. Yet he was not long permitted to enjoy this pre-eminence. He died in 925, at Farrington, and his death was immediately followed by that of his eldest son Ethelwald, at Oxford.¹

¹ Chron. Sax. 102, 105.

² To hlaforde and to mund-boran.—Chron. Sax. 169; also 106—109.

Edward had been thrice married, and left a numerous family. Of the sons who survived him, three successively ascended the throne, Athelstan, Edmund, and Edred. Six of his daughters were married to foreign princes, some of them the most powerful sovereigns in Europe: and three, Elfeda, Ethelhilda, and Eadburga, embraced a religious life. Of Eadburga the early history is curious. She was the youngest of Edward's children, and had been led by her father, when she was about three years old, into a room, in which he had previously placed a collection of female trinkets, and a chalice with the book of the Gospels. The child ran to the latter, and Edward, interpreting her choice as the destination of Heaven, embraced her and exclaimed: "Thou shalt be gratified in thy wishes; nor will thy parents regret, if they yield to thee in virtue." She was delivered to the care of her grandmother Alswitha, and of the nuns at Winchester; with whom she spent a long course of years, eminent among the sisters for her humility and devotion.²

In legislative and literary merit Edward was much inferior to his father: he surpassed him in the magnitude and the durability of his conquests. The subjection of the Danes to Alfred was only nominal; and at his death the kingdom, which he left to his son, was bounded by the Mercian counties on the banks of the Thames and the Severn. Edward, by steadily pursuing the same object, and insuring the submission of each district before he proceeded to further conquests, extended his rule over all the Danes of Mercia and East Anglia. Wherever he penetrated, he selected a strong position, and while a multitude of workmen surrounded it with a wall of stone, encamped in the neighbourhood for their protection.³ That these fortifications were equal to their object is evident from the fact, that not one of them was ever captured by the enemy; and they were productive, in after-ages, of consequences which this monarch could not possibly have foreseen. They were long the principal towns in England, and served to multiply a building this fortress that the "king of the Scots and all the people of the Scots, and the king of the Strathclyde Gaels, and all the Strathclyde Gaels" (the men of Galloway—Westmin. 184), "chose him for their father and lord."—Chron. Sax. 110. In other words, they did him homage; hominum fecerunt.—Mailros, 146.

¹ Chron. Sax. 111. The Chronicle tells us that Edward built a town and fortified it at Badecanwyllan, in Peacland, which Gibson conceives to be Bakewell, in Derbyshire. I think that Peacland means Lothian, which, according to Camden, was anciently called Pictland (Brit. p. 1181), and would therefore seek Badecanwyllan, the bathing-wells, in the neighbourhood of Bathgate, the road to the bath. For it was on occasion of his

² Malm. de Reg. ii. 13; de Pont. ii. f. 140.

³ Chron. Sax. 106, 108.

class of men of a higher order, and distinguished by greater privileges than the ceorles or husbandmen. To the burghers was intrusted the defence of their walls and of the adjacent country. By living in society, and having arms in their hands, they grew into consideration, and insensibly acquired such a degree of power and wealth as ultimately to open to their representatives the national council, and thus lay the foundation of that influence which the people enjoy in our present constitution.

During his reign an important alteration was effected in the ecclesiastical economy of the kingdom of Wessex. The frequent wars which had preceded the restoration of Alfred, had caused a relaxation of discipline, and, in many places, had revived the superstitions of paganism. Pope Formosus sought by threats and exhortations to awaken the zeal of the West-Saxon prelates, and suggested the propriety of increasing the number of their bishoprics. About the year 910 the two churches of Winchester and Sherborne became vacant, and Plegmund, archbishop of Canterbury, improved the opportunity to make a new division of the kingdom, and to establish three more dioceses, for the counties of Somerset, Devon, and Cornwall.¹

The most important of the religious foundations at this period was the new minster at Winchester. At the death of Alfred, the aged Grimbold had requested permission to retire to the friends of his youth, the clergy of St. Omer; but Edward, unwilling to be deprived of his services, prevailed on him to remain in England, by promising to provide for him, according to the intention of the late king, a monastery in the neighbourhood of the royal city. From the bishop Denulf and the canons he purchased three acres of land, on which he erected a spacious church and buildings for the accommodation of Grimbold and a society of clergymen, and bestowed on them the lands which his father had destined for that purpose in his will. To this new minster he transferred the remains of Alfred: and in the same place his own body, and that of his son Ethelward, were deposited.²

ATHELSTAN

THE FIRST MONARCH OF ENGLAND.

By the will of the late monarch the crown was left to Athelstan, his eldest son, about thirty years of age. The claim of the new king was immediately admitted by the thanes of Mercia, and after a short time by those of Wessex. The ceremony of his coronation was performed at Kingston by Athelm, archbishop of Canterbury, and the successor of Plegmund.³

Of the mother of Athelstan, Malmesbury has told a romantic tale, on the faith of an ancient ballad. She was the daughter of a neatherd, and called Egwina. Her superior beauty, even in her childhood, had attracted admiration: and a fortunate dream was said to portend that she would prove the mother of a powerful

¹ Wilk. Con. i. 190, 200. Ead. Nov. v. 123.

² Monast. Ang. p. 208, 209. Annal. de Hyde apud Alf. iii. p. 201, 205. Chron. Sax. p. 111. During Edward's reign the English made frequent pilgrimages to Rome. In 921 many were massacred in passing the Alps, by the Saracens from Frazinetum. A few years later many others met with the same fate.—Chron. Flodoardi apud Bouquet, vii. 177, 180.

³ Chron. Sax. 111. Malm. 26. In Malmesbury we have three different accounts of Athelstan, which should be carefully distinguished. The first he compiled himself from documents within his reach. The second he abridged from the longer work of a contemporary poet, whose extravagant praises of his patron he reduced to the standard of probability and common sense. The last is a collection of facts for which no written authority could be found; but which were mentioned in Anglo-Saxon songs transmitted from one generation to another.—Malm. 26—29.

monarch. This report excited the curiosity of the lady who had nursed the children of Alfred. She took Egwina to her house, and educated her as one of her own family. When the etheling Edward casually visited his former nurse, he saw the daughter of the neatherd, and was captivated with her beauty. Athelstan was the fruit of their mutual affection.¹ From this very doubtful story it has been inferred that the king was an illegitimate son: but the force of the inference is weakened by the testimony of a contemporary poetess, who, in mentioning the birth of Athelstan, alludes to the inferior descent of his mother, but at the same time calls her the partner of Edward's throne.² The child was the delight of his grandfather Alfred, who created him a knight by investing him with a mantle of purple, and a short sword in a golden scabbard. After the death of his mother he was intrusted to the care of his aunt Ethelfleda, a fortunate circumstance, as it probably caused his interests to be, at this period, so eagerly espoused by the natives of Mercia.³

In Wessex Athelstan had to guard against the secret designs of his enemies, of whom the most dangerous was the etheling Alfred. The associates of this prince had conspired to seize the person of the king at Winchester, and to deprive him of his sight. On the discovery of the plot, Alfred demanded, according to the forms of the Saxon jurisprudence, to clear himself by oath; and Athelstan, who dared not refuse the privilege, sent him to Rome in the custody of his messengers, to perform the ceremony in the presence of the pontiff. The unfortunate etheling swore to his innocence on the altar of St. Peter. But as he survived his oath only three days, his death was considered a sufficient proof of his guilt by the witan, who adjudged his estates to the king. By him they were given to the monastery of Malmesbury.⁴

Sightric, the Danish king of Northumbria, had braved the power of Edward: he solicited the friendship of Athelstan, and with it his sister Editha in marriage. The two princes met at Tamworth. Sightric was baptized, received the hand of Editha, and accepted from Athelstan a grant of what he already possessed, the country between the Tees and the Frith of the Forth.⁵ It is said, that the barbarian soon repented of his choice, and abandoned both his wife and religion;⁶ it is certain that he died at the end of twelve months, and that Athelstan seized the opportunity to annex Northumbria to his own dominions. The two sons of Sightric fled before the superior power of the Anglo-Saxon; Godfrid into Scotland, and Anlaff into Ireland. Anlaff had the good fortune to meet with friends and associates; but Constantine, the king of the Scots, dared not afford an asylum to the enemy of Athelstan; and Godfrid, after a fruitless attempt to surprise the city of York, voluntarily surrendered himself to the mercy of the conqueror. He was received with humanity and treated with honour: but the mind of the Dane could not brook the idea of dependence, and on the fourth day he fled to the coast, and commenced the profession of a sea-king.⁷

The ambition of Athelstan now grasped at the sovereignty of the whole island. In the north he

¹ Malm. 29.

² Quem peperit regi consors non inelyta regni.—Hrosvitha, de Gestis Odon. p. 165. The words consors regni show that Egwina was a crowned queen, and consequently the king's wife. Non inelyta is applied to her because she was not of the royal race; but Malmesbury and Florence state that she was of a very noble family: illustris femina—mulier nobilissima.—Malm. i. 197.

³ Malm. 210.

⁴ Id. 220.

⁵ Malm. 27. Wallingford, 540.

⁶ Westmin. 185.

⁷ Malm. 27.

levelled with the ground the castle of York, the principal bulwark of the Danish power; Ealdred, the son of Ealdulf, a Saxon chieftain, was compelled to yield to him the strong castle of Bamborough; and the king of Scots, and the prince of Cumberland, obeyed his summons, and acknowledged his superiority. On the west he intimidated the Britons of Wales and Cornwall. The chieftains of the former waited on him at Hereford, where they stipulated to confine their countrymen to the right bank of the Wye, and to pay a yearly tribute of twenty pounds of gold, three hundred pounds of silver, and five thousand head of cattle. The Cornish Britons had hitherto reached from the Land's-end to the river Ex, and possessed one half of Exeter. He commanded them to retire beyond the Tamar, surrounded the city with a strong wall of stone, and frequently honoured it with his presence. To confirm his claim of sovereignty, he convened at a place called Eadmote all the princes of the Scots, Cambrians, and Britons, who, placing their hands between his, swore to him that fealty, which the Saxon vassal was accustomed to swear to his lord.¹

During this tide of success, and when Athelstan had just reached the zenith of his power, Edwin, the eldest of his brothers, perished at sea. The traditionary ballads, consulted by Malmsbury, attribute his death to the jealousy of the king, who, convinced of his own illegitimacy, suspected Edwin of aspiring to that crown which belonged to him by the right of inheritance. It was in vain that the young prince asserted his innocence upon oath; and when his oath was disregarded, threw himself on the affection of his brother. The tyrant thought his own safety incompatible with the life of Edwin; and, while he affected the praise of lenity by commuting the sentence of death into that of banishment, committed his victim to the mercy of the waves in an open and shattered boat, with only one companion. The prince, in a paroxysm of despair, leaped into the sea; his attendant coolly waited for the flow of the tide, and was wafted back to the shore in the neighbourhood of Dover. Athelstan, it is added, when it was too late, repented of his cruelty, submitted to a course of canonical penance, and built the church of Middleton, that prayers might be daily offered for the soul of his murdered brother. Such is the tale which Malmsbury has preserved, but of which he does not presume to affirm or deny the truth.² It seems not to deserve credit. No trace of it is to be discovered in the contemporary biographer of Athelstan, and in the poem from which it was extracted, it was coupled with another tale evidently fabulous.³ That Edwin perished at sea cannot be doubted; but the king appears rather to have deplored his death as a calamity than

¹ Malmsbury, 27, 28. Florence, 602. Mailros, 147. The contemporary writer in Malmsbury makes the tribute of the Welsh amount to 25,000 cattle. I have preferred the more moderate account of Caradoc, p. 48.

² Non constanter sed tubanter.—Malm. 25. Non ut defendam, sed ne lectorum scientiam defraudem.—Id. 29. The story is repeated by Sim. 134, 154. Hoved. 242. West. 186. Brompt. 836. It may, however, be observed, that Simeon, Hoveden, and Westminster have all copied the same words from one common document. Florence (603), who usually copies the same, has in this instance deserted it, and omitted entirely the death of Edwin.

³ The ballad proceeds to say that it was the butler of Athelstan who urged his master to the death of Edwin; that one day as he waited on the king, his foot slipped, and recovering himself with the other, he exclaimed, "Thus brother helps brother." The words reminding Athelstan of the fate of Edwin, he ordered the butler to be put to death.—Malm. 29. This kind of story seems to have been a favourite with the Anglo-Saxons. The reader will meet with another edition of it in the History of Edward the Confessor.

to have regretted it as a crime. The account of Huntingdon contains all that can now be known of the transaction: "Soon afterwards he had the misfortune to lose in the waves of the ocean his brother Edwin, a youth of great vigour and good disposition."¹

The king of Scots eagerly sought to free himself from his dependence on the English monarch; and with this view entered into alliance with Howel, king of Wales. But the power of Athelstan was irresistible. At the head of his army he extended his ravages as far as Dunfædor and Westmore, while his fleet pillaged the coast to the extremity of Caithness. Constantine was compelled to implore the clemency of the conqueror, and to surrender his son as an hostage for his fidelity.²

Three years afterwards, the superiority of the English king was threatened by a more formidable confederacy. In 937 a fleet of six hundred and fifteen sail cast anchor in the Humber. It obeyed the commands of Anlaff, who was come with an army of Irish and northern adventurers to reconquer the dominions of his father. His arrival was the signal of war to his confederates, the Scots and Britons, who under their respective princes directed their march to the same spot. The lieutenants of Athelstan, unable to repel the torrent, endeavoured to retard its progress. Negotiations were opened to gain time for the arrival of Athelstan, who, not content with his own forces, had purchased the aid of several sea-kings. As he passed through Beverley, he visited the church, offered his dagger on the altar, and vowed to redeem it, if he returned victorious, at a price worthy of a king. The armies were soon in the neighbourhood of each other, when Anlaff planned a midnight attack, in the hope of surprising and killing his adversary. To discover the quarters of Athelstan, he is said to have adopted an artifice familiar to the Northmen. The minstrel was in that age a sacred character: and Anlaff with his harp in his hands fearlessly entered the English camp, mixed without suspicion among the troops, and was at last conducted to the royal pavilion. The king, who was at dinner, bade the stranger strike his harp, and rewarded him for his song. But the disguise of the pretended minstrel could not conceal him from the eye of a soldier, who had once served under his standard, but who disdained to betray his former leader. As soon as Anlaff was out of danger, this man related the circumstance to Athelstan, and to the charge of perfidy, indignantly replied: "No; I have shown that my honour is above temptation; and remember that if I had been perfidious to him, I might also have proved perfidious to you." The king accepted the apology, and by his advice removed to a distant part of the field. The ground which he had left was afterwards occupied by the bishop of Sherborne. In the dead of the night the alarm was given: Anlaff with a body of chosen followers was in the midst of the camp, and a bloody and doubtful conflict ensued. In the morning, when he retired, it was discovered that the prelate had perished with all his attendants.³

Two days after this occurrence, was fought the battle of Brunanburh, in

¹ That Edwin perished at sea is asserted by the Saxon Chronicle (111), and Mailros (147). The words of Huntingdon are: Nec multo post adversa percussus fortuna fratrem suum Edwinum magni vigoris juvenem et bonæ indolis maris fluctibus flebiliter amisit.—Hunt. 204, 158, 159.

² Chron. Sax. 111. Sim. Dun. 134.

Floren. 603. On this account Ethelwerd, a contemporary, says: Colla subdunt Scoti pariterque Picti, uno solidantur Britannidis arva.—Ethelw. 482. Scotiam sibi subjungendo perdomuit.—Sim. Dun. 25.

³ Malm. 26. His authority for this story was probably nothing more than some ancient ballad.

Northumbria; a battle celebrated in the relics of Saxon and Scandinavian poetry. The multitude of the confederates consisted of five nations, Norwegians, Danes, Irish, Scots, and Britons; in the English army waved a hundred banners, and round each banner, if we may believe the exaggeration of a contemporary, were ranged a thousand warriors. The contest lasted till sunset. A northern sea-king, in the pay of Athelstan, was opposed to the Irish, and after an obstinate struggle drove them into a wood at no great distance. Turketul with the citizens of London, and Singin with the men of Worcester-shire, penetrated into the midst of the Scots, killed the son of their king, and compelled Constantine to save himself by a precipitate flight. Anlaf still maintained his position against all the efforts of Athelstan and his West Saxons; but the victors returning from the pursuit, fell on his rear, and decided the fortune of the battle. The Northmen escaped the sword of his enemies; but he left five confederate sea-kings, seven jarls, and many thousands of his followers, on the field of battle. "Never," says the native poet, "since the arrival of the Saxons and Angles, those artists of war, was such a carnage known in England." The conqueror, in his return from the battle, redeemed his dagger from the church of Beverley with a grant of ample and valuable privileges.¹

This splendid victory crushed the enemies, and confirmed the ascendancy of Athelstan. By the Northmen he was distinguished with the appellation of "the conqueror."² The British princes no longer disputed his authority; the chieftains of the East-Anglian and Northumbrian Danes, who under a nominal vassalage had so often maintained a real independence, entirely disappeared; and all the countries originally conquered and colonized by the different Saxon tribes became united under the same crown. To Athelstan belongs the glory of having established what has ever since been called the kingdom of England. His predecessors, till the reign of Alfred, had been styled kings of Wessex. That monarch and his son Edward assumed the title of kings of the Anglo-Saxons. Athelstan sometimes called himself king of the English; at other times claimed the more pompous designation of king of all Britain.³ Both these titles were indiscriminately employed by his immediate successors; but in the course of a century the latter fell into disuse; the former has been retained to the present age.⁴

As the power of the king became predominant in Britain, his influence began to be felt upon the continent. He maintained a friendly correspondence with several foreign courts; and three princes, destined to act important parts in the concerns of Europe, were educated under his protection. I. The first was Haco,

¹ Chron. Sax. 112—114. Egilli Saga apud Johnstone, 31. Ingulf, 37. Mailros, 147. Malm. 27, 28.

² Snorre, p. 119. He also calls him Athelstan the Faithful.—Ibid.

³ For Alfred, see Heming. Chart. i. 42; Asser, 1, 3: for Edward, Gale, iii. p. 362: for Athelstan, id. p. 364; the coins in Camden, Tab. 4, 5, in Hickee's Diss. tab. ii., and the MS. in the Cotton Library, Tiberius, A. 2. Athelstan ab omnibus imperator totius Britannie est pronuntiatus.—Flor. 693. Subactis ubique hostibus totius Britannie dominium obtinuit.—Sim. Dun. 18. He calls himself Rex totius Britannie: Totius Britannie regni solio sublimatus.—Basileus industrius Anglorum, cunctarumque gentium in circuitu persistentium.—Cod. Dip. ii. 183, 194, 206.

⁴ In the reign of Ethelred the appellation of Anglo or English seems to have almost superseded that of Saxon. For Ethelweard, of the royal race of Wessex, calls his own countrymen West Angles, and the South and East Saxons, South and East Angles.—See Ethelweard, i. ii. and iii. passim.

the younger son of Harold Harfagre, the powerful king of Norway. When the father sent the child to the English court, he presented the king with a magnificent ship, of which the sails were of purple, while the beak was covered with plates of gold, and the inside hung round with gilded shields. At the death of Harold, Eric, the elder brother, ascended the throne; but he soon lost, by his cruelty, the affection of his subjects; and Athelstan sent his "foster son," with a powerful fleet, to obtain possession of the sceptre. The enterprise succeeded; English missionaries under the protection of the new king disseminated the doctrines of the gospel; and the reign of Haco the Good is still celebrated in the annals of Norway.¹ II. A second ward of the English king was Alan of Bretagne. The charitable donations of Ethelwulf, Alfred, and Edward, to the churches of Armorica, had given rise to an intercourse between the English and the transmarine Britons, who still, at the distance of four centuries, lamented their banishment from the land of their fathers.² When the Normans under Rollo depopulated Bretagne, numbers of the natives sought and obtained an asylum under the protection of Athelstan. Among the fugitives was Matheudoï, who had married the daughter of Alan the Great; and who committed his infant son to the care of his friend. Athelstan stood sponsor to the young prince at his baptism; watched over his education; and at a proper age sent him back to his native country with the surviving exiles, and a band of English adventurers. The young Alan proved himself worthy of his protector; he recovered by degrees the territories of his grandfather; and by a long series of splendid actions made himself the sovereign of Bretagne.³ III. Athelstan's own nephew was the third of his royal pupils. His sister Edgiva had been married to Charles the Simple, king of France, to whom she bore a son Louis, who, from his long exile in England, was surnamed D'Outremer. Three years afterwards, her husband was imprisoned by the treachery of Herbert, count of Vermandois; but the queen escaped with her child, and was received with an affectionate welcome by her father Edward. When Athelstan succeeded to the throne, he was not indifferent to the interests of his sister and nephew. In 926 the friends of Charles made an attempt to obtain his freedom, and Louis was sent at their request to France; but the efforts of the royalists were speedily repressed, and the young prince sought again the protection of his uncle. After an exile of thirteen years he recovered the throne of his fathers. Athelstan had contracted a friendship with the duke of Normandy, who was induced, at the death of Rodulf, the successor of Charles, to espouse the interests of Louis.⁴ An embassy from France, at the head of which was the archbishop of Sens, demanded the rightful descendant of Charlemagne; they swore in the hands of Athelstan and Edgiva, that he should be immediately put in possession of the royal authority; and Louis sailed to Boulogne with a splendid retinue of Anglo-Saxon thanes and prelates. He was received by a deputation of the French nobility, ¹ Malms. 28. Snorre, 121, 138, 160. Havnia, 1777. Mr. Turner has the merit of calling the attention of writers to the connection between Athelstan and the king of Norway (vol. ii. 53—91). It is disputed by Lappenberg (ii. 105).

² In exulatu atque in captivitate in Francia commoramur.—Epist. Radbodi Dol. Epis. Gale, iii. 364.

³ Chron. Nannet. apud Bouquet, vii. 276. Gul. Gemet. iii. 1.

⁴ Hugo Floriac. apud Bouquet, vii. 319. Item, 304. Chron. Turon. ix.

conducted in state to Laon, and crowned with the usual solemnity.¹ But he soon found himself opposed by the factions which had dethroned his father, and were now supported by Otho of Germany; and therefore solicited the assistance of his uncle, whose fleet ravaged with impunity the lands of his enemies along the coast of Flanders.² As for Edgiva, she continued to hold a distinguished place in the councils and court of her son; till in an unlucky hour she fixed her affections on the count of Meaux, son of the man who had wrested the sceptre from her husband. At her instigation he carried her off, as it were, by force, and married her as soon as they arrived in a place of apparent safety. Louis was indignant at the conduct of his mother. He immediately pursued the fugitives, made Edgiva his prisoner, and committed her to the custody of his queen Herberge.³

Besides Edgiva and the wife of Sightric the Northumbrian, Athelstan had seven other sisters, of whom three put on the veil, four were married to some of the most powerful princes in Europe. 1. In 926, Hugo the Great, father to the founder of the Capetian dynasty, solicited the hand of Ethilda. He had been among the most active enemies of Charles the Simple; but had recently declared in favour of the captive monarch; and had selected for his ambassador Adulf of Flanders, the cousin of Athelstan. In the assembly of the witan at Abingdon were displayed the numerous and costly presents which he had sent, perfumes, jewels, relics, horses, the sword of Constantine the Great, and the spear of Charlemagne. Before this splendid exhibition his former demerits disappeared; and Ethilda became the wife of a noble Frank, who without the title, possessed the wealth and power of a king.

2. Soon after the battle of Brunanburh, the emperor, Henry the Fowler, sought a consort for his son Otho among the sisters of Athelstan. The king appears to have been flattered by the request; and to return the compliment, he sent both Editha and Ediva to Germany, that the imperial suitor might make his choice. Before their departure each princess received presents from the king, the thanes, and the prelates, the only dower she could offer to her future husband. They were conducted as far as Cologne by the chancellor Turketul. Otho preferred Editha; her sister was married to a prince whose name has not been preserved, but whose dominions lay near the Alps. 3. There only remained Elgiva, the youngest and most beautiful of the daughters of Edward. She accepted the hand of Louis of Arles, prince of Aquitain.⁴

In the year 941, October 27th, Athelstan died, regretted by his subjects, and admired by the surrounding nations. He was of a slender habit, and middling stature. His hair, which was yellow, he wore in ringlets entwined with thread of gold. Among the higher orders of the nobility he maintained that reserve which became his superior

¹ Flodoardi Hist. iv. 26. Chron. Viridun. apud Bouquet, vii. 290. Chron. Osoran. viii. 237.

² Chron. Flodoard. vii. 183.

³ Daniel, Hist. de France, ann. 951. Chron. Flodoardi, viii. 207. Edgiva's epitaph may be seen in Mabillon, Anal. i. 427.

⁴ For these marriages see Ethelwerd (473), Ingulf (37, 38), Malmesbury (25, 28), Westminster (185, 186), and Hrovitha, de Gestis Odonis, 161—165. There is much confusion with respect to the names of the princesses, and their foreign husbands. Bouquet (ix. 21, not. e) makes the prince near the Alps, but without quoting his authority, Eblus, the son of Rainulf, count of Poitou. Some have thought that Louis of Arles died too early to have been married to Elgiva; but L'Art de vérifier les Dates states that he could not have died before 928, probably later.

station: to the lower classes of his subjects he was affable and condescending. From his father he had inherited a considerable treasure; but his liberality was not inferior to his opulence, and the principal use which he made of money was to enrich others. To his vassals he was accustomed to make valuable presents; the spoil collected in his military expeditions was always divided among his followers; and his munificence to the clergy was proved by the churches which he erected or repaired.¹ Neither ought his charities to be left unnoticed. He annually redeemed at his private expense a certain number of convicts, who had forfeited their liberty for their crimes; and his bailiffs were ordered, under severe penalties, to support a pauper of English extraction on every two of his farms.² As a legislator he was anxious to suppress offences, to secure an impartial administration of justice, and to preserve the standard coin of the realm in a state of purity. With this view he held assemblies of the witan at Greatly, Faversham, Exeter, and Thundersfield: associations were formed under his auspices for the protection of property; and regulations were enacted respecting the apprehension, the trial, and the punishment of malefactors. Negligence in the execution of the laws was severely chastised. A thane paid to the crown a fine of sixty shillings; a superior magistrate was amerced in double that sum, with the forfeiture of his office.³ In his will he had chosen the abbey of Malmesbury for the place of his sepulture. There he had deposited the remains of his cousins Ælfwin and Ethelwin, who fell at Brunanburh; and to the same place his body was conveyed in solemn pomp, followed by a long train of prelates and nobles, and surrounded by the presents which he had bequeathed to the monastery.⁴

EDMUND.

The civil wars, which formerly desolated Northumbria, have been mentioned already: after the extinction of its native kings it continued to present similar scenes of anarchy and bloodshed. Its chieftains were partly of Saxon, partly of Danish origin, alike in disposition and habits; but enemies to each other, and equally regardless of treachery or of violence, when it could contribute to their aggrandisement. Every sea-king was certain of finding an asylum among them; and if he had the ambition to aspire to a throne, there were never wanting men willing to draw the sword in his cause. Sometimes a fortunate adventurer extended his authority over the whole nation: sometimes two or more shared the sovereign power among them. But they were no better than flitting shadows of royalty, following each other in rapid succession. After a year or two many of them perished by the treachery of their friends or the swords of their enemies; many were compelled to abandon the country, and revert to the pursuits of piracy; hardly one transmitted the inheritance of his authority to his children. Occasionally necessity extorted from them an acknowledgment of the superiority claimed by the kings of Wessex: but the moment the danger was removed, they uniformly forgot their oaths, and resumed the exercise of their independence. It seems to have mattered little whether these princes were natives or foreigners: the pride of the inhabitants was

¹ All these particulars are mentioned by his contemporary biographer, apud Malm. 27.

² Each pauper received annually a complete suit of clothes, and monthly a measure of meal, a gammon of bacon, or a ram worth four pennies.—Leg. Sax. 56.

³ Leg. 54—69.

⁴ Malm. 29.

satisfied, provided they did not crouch to the pretensions of the southern Saxons, whose superior civilization was viewed with contempt by the barbarism of the Northumbrians.

After the battle of Brunanburh the terror of Athelstan had kept this turbulent people under some restraint; but at his death their ancient spirit revived; Anlaff was invited to hazard a third time the fortune of war; and within a few weeks the Humber was covered by a numerous fleet of foreign adventurers. The sea-king rested his hope of success on the rapidity of his motions, and, marching into Mercia, obtained possession of Tamworth. Edmund, the brother of Athelstan, and about eighteen years of age, had been crowned at Kingston, and hastened to oppose the invaders. The operations of the campaign are involved in much obscurity. The success which attended the first efforts of Edmund, seems to have been balanced by a subsequent defeat; and the respective losses of the two princes induced them to listen to the suggestions of the archbishops Odo and Wulfstan, who laboured to effect a pacification. The vanity of our chroniclers has exhibited the transaction in partial colours: but the conditions of the treaty prove the superiority of Anlaff. Edmund ceded in full sovereignty to the Dane all the provinces on the north of the Watling-street.¹

The sea-king did not long enjoy his good fortune. He died the next year, and Edmund improved the opportunity to recover the dominions which he had lost. His measures were planned with foresight, and executed with vigour. The five-burghs, as they were called, of Derby, Leicester, Nottingham, Stamford, and Lincoln, had long been inhabited by the descendants of Danes, who, though they made a profession of obedience to the English monarchs, considered it a duty to favour the enterprises of their kinsmen. These towns formed as it were a chain of fortresses running through Mercia, and garrisoned by enemies. The king began his operations by reducing them in succession. Their inhabitants were expelled, and replaced by English colonies.² Edmund next proceeded into Northumbria. That country was already divided between two princes, one of whom, like his predecessor, was called Anlaff, the other styled himself Reginald, king of York. They submitted without resistance to the superior power of Edmund, acknowledged themselves his vassals, and embraced Christianity. The king stood sponsor to Anlaff at his baptism, and adopted Reginald for a son, when he received confirmation. Yet he had hardly left the country, when they again asserted their independence. Their perfidy soon met with its punishment. The archbishop of York and the ealdorman of Mercia united their forces, and drove the two rebels out of the country.³

A sense of their own danger had hitherto taught the Britons of Cumbria to assist their neighbours in these struggles to maintain their independence. It was against them that Edmund next directed his arms. Every effort which they could make was hopeless: the two sons of Dunmail, their king, fell into the hands of the conqueror, and were deprived of sight, and the country was bestowed on Malcolm, king of Scots, on the condition that he should become the vassal of the English crown, and should unite with Edmund in op-

¹ Besides the printed chroniclers, see another in MS. quoted by Mr. Turner, Tib. B. 4. Westminster (187) adds to the condition of the treaty, that the survivor was to succeed to the dominions of the other. This is not mentioned by any other writer.

² Chron. Sax. 114. Hunt. 203. Flor. 603.

³ Ethel. 482. Flor. 604. Hunt. 203.

posing the attempts of the seakings.¹

The reign of Edmund lasted only six years. He was celebrating at Pucklekirk in Gloucestershire the feast of St. Augustine, the apostle of the Saxons, when he perceived Leof, a noted outlaw, enter the hall. This man had been banished on account of his crimes some years before; and now had the audacity to seat himself at the royal table, and to offer resistance, when the cup-bearer ordered him to depart. Passion hurried Edmund to the spot, where he received a wound in the breast from a dagger which Leof had concealed under his clothes. The king immediately expired: the assassin was cut in pieces by the royal attendants.²

Edmund had been married to Ælf-give, a princess of exemplary virtue, whose solicitude for the relief of the indigent, and charity in purchasing the liberty of slaves, have been highly extolled by our ancient writers.³ She bore him two sons, Edwy and Edgar, of whom the eldest could not be more than nine years of age. Their childhood rendered them incapable of directing the government; and in an assembly of the prelates, thanes, and vassal princes of Wales, their uncle Edred, the only surviving son of Edward, was chosen king; and, to use the inflated language of a charter given on the occasion, was "consecrated at Kingston to the quadripartite government of the Anglo-Saxons, Northumbrians, Pagans, and Britons."⁴

EDRED.

The reign of Edred was principally distinguished by the final subjugation of Northumbria. Immediately after his coronation he proceeded to that country; and received first from the natives, afterwards from the Scots, and lastly from the Cumbrians, the usual oaths of fidelity.⁵ But the obedience of the Northumbrians lasted only as long as they were overawed by his presence: he was no sooner departed, than they expelled his officers, and set his authority at defiance. Eric, who had been driven from Norway by his brother Haco, and had wandered for years a pirate on the ocean, landed on their coast, and was immediately saluted king. The news excited the indignation of Edred. His first object was to secure the important city of York; and with that view he despatched his chancellor Turketul to Archbishop Wulfstan, to confirm the wavering fidelity of that prelate and the citizens. The king soon afterwards entered Northumbria at the head of the men of Wessex and Mercia; and by ravaging the lands

¹ Ut sibi terra et mari fidelis esset.—Lel. Coll. ii. 399. Sim. 150. Hunt. 203. Flor. 604. His midwyrhta, or associate in war.—Chron. Sax. 115. Ut Aquilonares Anglie partes terra marique ab hostium adventantium incursione tueretur.—West. 188. Fordun (iv. 24) asserts that, according to the agreement between the two kings, the heir to the crown of Scotland was always to hold Cumberland of the crown of England. The spot where Dunmail was defeated is still marked with a heap of stones, about nine miles from Keswick, on the road to Ambleside.—West. 82.

² It has been disputed whether he was assassinated in 946 or 948. But there is a charter of Edred, given at the coronation of that prince in 946, and several others by the same, dated in 947.—See Cod. Dipl. ii. 268, 270, 272.

³ Ælfgive has been sometimes said to have been only the king's mistress, because in a charter she calls herself concubina regis. But concubina in the Latin of that age had the same meaning as conlaterna and consors. Most certainly the king's mistress would not be called upon to sign his charters. By the chroniclers she is styled "the holy queen," and Ethelwerd, who could not be ignorant, terms her Edmund's wife and queen.—In eodem anno obiit regina Elfgyn Eadmundi regis conjux (lib. iv. c. vi.). She died before the king.

⁴ Smith's Bed. App. 772.

⁵ Flor. 604. West. 189. "The Scots gave him their oaths that they would will whatever he should will."—Chron. Sax. 115. Cui Northymbri subjiuntur cuncti, necnon Scotti iuramenta confirmant, immutabilemque fidem.—Ethelw. 482.

severely punished the perfidy of the rebels. But as he led back his followers, laden with pillage, and unsuspecting of danger, the gates of York were thrown open in the night; a chosen band of adventurers silently followed his march; and a division of his army was surprised and destroyed. To avenge this insult he resumed the work of devastation: but his anger was appeased by presents, entreaties, and submission: and he returned in triumph with a long train of captives to London. Eric might still perhaps have maintained himself in the country, had he not been opposed by a new competitor, Anlaf, one of the princes who had fled from the sword of Edmund in the last reign. The two rivals assembled their forces: Anlaf was victorious: and the Norwegian with his son and brother perished in the wilds of Stanemoor by the treachery of Osulf, and the sword of Macco, the son of Anlaf.¹

This was the last struggle of Northumbrian independence. Edred returned with a numerous army, and traversed the country without opposition. Large and fertile districts were laid desolate: the archbishop, whose conduct had greatly irritated the king, was immured for a year within the castle of Withamby;² the principal noblemen were torn from their dependants, and carried by the king into captivity; the whole province, like the rest of England, was divided into shires, ridings, and wapentakes; and the government was intrusted to a number of officers, appointed by Edred under the superintendence of Osulf, who took the title of earl of Northumberland.³

Edred was afflicted with a lingering and painful disease;⁴ and much of the merit of his reign must be attributed to the counsels of his favourite ministers, his chancellor Turketul, and Dunstan, abbot of Glastonbury. Turketul was a clergyman of royal descent, the eldest son of Ethelwerd, and the grandson of Alfred. He had refused preferment in the church, but accepted and retained the office of chancellor or secretary to the king, under his cousins Athelstan, Edmund, and Edred. His virtues and abilities were honoured with the approbation of the prince, and the applause of the people. He held the first place in the royal councils; the most important offices, both civil and ecclesiastical, were conferred by his advice; and his attendance on the sovereign was required in every military expedition. The important part which he acted in the battle of Brunanburh has been already noticed.⁵ When he was sent by Edred to Archbishop Wolstan, it chanced that his road led him by the episcopalis honor apud Doracester restituitur.—Hov. Ann. 953. Hence it has been said that he was made bishop of Dorchester: but this cannot be, for he afterwards signed charters as before with the title and precedence of archbishop of York, in the Codex Diplomaticus, ii. 304, 5, 6, 317.

¹ Ing. 30, 41. West. 189. Mail. 148.

² What was Wulfstan's offence? According to Ingulf, he was suspected of having favoured the rebellion of the Northumbrians in the second year of Edred's reign, though he had been recalled to his duty by the advice of Turketul. (Ing. f. 498.) It is difficult to understand the narrative of Malmesbury, who in one place (De Pont. iii. f. 153, b.) evidently confounds Edmund with Edred; and in another (De Reg. i. 232) says that he was charged with favouring his countrymen in transfigio. Wendover states that several charges were brought against him, principally that he had punished with death several burghers of Thetford for the murder of the abbot Aldhelm.—Wend. Ann. 951. He was restored to liberty, and to the exercise of his office, in a council held at Dorchester. Wulfstano a custodia soluto

³ Ing. 41. Sim. 156. Walling. 541.

⁴ Malm. 30. He was for a long time unable to take any solid food (Vit. S. Dun. in Act. SS. p. 363): a most unlucky circumstance for an Anglo-Saxon king, of whom it was expected that he should be the foremost in the pleasures of the table as well as the dangers of the field.

⁵ Ingulf remarks (p. 37), that though he led the troops to battle, he refused to make use of arms, because the canons prohibited to clergymen the effusion of blood. It was, however, the doctrine of the age, that an ruins of Croyland, which still afforded a miserable shelter to three monks, the survivors of the Danish devastations. Turketul was affected by the piety and resignation of these aged anchorites; and felt a secret desire to enter into their society, and to restore their monastery to its ancient splendour. At his return he solicited, and after several refusals, obtained, the permission of his sovereign. The public crier announced to the citizens of London that the chancellor, before he quitted his office, was anxious to discharge all his debts, and to make threefold reparation to any person whom he might have injured. When he had satisfied every demand, he gave fifty-four of his manors, the inheritance which he had received from his father, to the king, and reserved six for the use of his monastery. At Croyland he made his monastic profession, received the investiture from Edred, was blessed by the bishop of Dorchester, and the next day by the advice of the lawyers resigned the abbey with its appurtenances into the hands of the sovereign. All the lands which formerly belonged to it, had, during the Danish wars, been seized by Burhred, king of Mercia, who annexed a part to the crown, and divided the remainder among his thanes. The former were cheerfully restored by the piety of Edred; of the latter several manors were purchased from the present possessors by Turketul. At the next meeting of the witan he received a new grant of the whole from the king in the most ample form, but with the exception of the privilege of sanctuary, which he refused, as a violation of justice and an incentive to crime. From this period he spent seven-and-twenty years in the discharge of his duties as abbot. The zeal of the preceptor was rewarded by the proficiency of his disciples; and at his death in 975 the monks of Croyland formed a numerous and edifying community.¹

The abbot of Glastonbury, the other favourite of Edred, occupies a disproportionate space in most of our modern histories. Nearly related to Athelm, archbishop of Canterbury, and to Elphege, bishop of Winchester, he had been introduced by them a candidate for royal favour to the court of King Athelstan. But the jealousy of rivals, and the reflections suggested by a dangerous illness, diverted the thoughts of the young thane from worldly pursuits to the monastic state; and having received the order of priesthood, he served during several years the church of Glastonbury. In this situation his zeal, disinterestedness, and charities attracted the notice of the public; by Turketul he was recommended to the favour of Edmund; and that prince bestowed on him Glastonbury with its possessions. By Edred, Dunstan was not less respected than he had been by his predecessor. The new king made him the director of his conscience; deposited with him his treasures and the titles to his lands; and earnestly solicited him to accept the vacant bishopric of Winchester. This preferment he declined; and, while he was more obscurely employed in the government of his monastery, unexpectedly lost his friend and benefactor. The king, whose constitution had been enfeebled by frequent returns of his disease, expired in the tenth year of his reign, and was buried at Winchester² November 23.

exception was allowed in war undertaken for the protection of the country against a pagan invasion.—Ibid.

¹ See Ingulf, 25, 30—41, 52. That the original work of Ingulf has been interpolated by his transcribers, must be admitted. This of course detracts from its authority. But much of what it narrates respecting the royal descent, the riches, and the donations of Turketul, is confirmed by Orderic, p. 340.

² Ang. Sac. ii. 90—104. Malm. 30. MS. Cleop. 13, B xiii. f. 60.

CHAPTER V.

ANGLO-SAXONS.—A.D. 955.

REIGNS OF EDWY—EDGAR—EDWARD THE MARTYR—ETHELRED—AND EDMUND, SURNAMED IRONSIDE.

EDWY.

AT the accession of Edred, his nephews Edwy and Edgar had been passed by on account of their childhood; at his death the elder of the two brothers was chosen king by the unanimous voice of the witan, and entered immediately on the full exercise of the royal authority.¹

We are assured by the most ancient writers that the character of the young monarch—he could not be more than sixteen or seventeen years of age—was already marked by the violence of his passions. Until he received the regal unction, he appeared indeed to listen with some deference to the admonitions of Archbishop Odo; but from the moment of his coronation he conceived himself above control; and on the very day of that ceremony, when he was seated at table after dinner with the nobility and clergy, abruptly left the company, to keep an appointment with a favourite female, of the name of Ethelgive, who, with her daughter, awaited his coming in a neighbouring apartment.² If we may listen to the scandal of the age, chastity was not her distinguishing virtue, nor did her visit to the royal youth originate in the most delicate motives.³ A general murmur spoke the indignation of the company. At their request, the abbot of Glastonbury, with the prelate Kynsey, entered the chamber, and the unwilling prince was persuaded or compelled to resume his seat. By the language of modern prejudice the share which Dunstan bore in this transaction has been described as an attempt to subdue the spirit of the king, and a daring insult to the royal authority; but let the reader advert to the manners of the age, and he will not be surprised, if the witan resented the abrupt departure of the king, or their messengers treated with little ceremony the women who had drawn him away.

The affront, however, sunk deep into the mind of Edwy; and Dunstan, aware how grievously he had offended, withdrew after a while from the court, to bury himself in the obscurity tamen mulier per nefandum familiaritatis lenocinium sectando inhærebat, eotenus videlicet quo sese vel etiam natam suam sub conjugali titulo illi innectendo sociaret.—Repente prosiluit lascivus ad prædictum scelus lenocinii—invenerunt illum inter utrasque volutantem.—MS. Cleop. p. 76. This writer was a contemporary; and it is evident from the words in italics that Edwy was not then married. Nor does the contrary appear from the Abingdon Charters. Supposing the subscriptions to them genuine, it will only follow that the king was married when he signed the charters, not that he was married on the day of his coronation.

¹ It is observable that the ancient writers almost always speak of our kings as elect. Edwy's grandmother, in her charter (Lye, App. iv.), says: "He was chosen, gecoren." The contemporary biographer of Dunstan (apud Boll. tom. iv. Maji, 344) says: Ab universis Anglorum principibus communi electione. He also intimates that Wessex and Mercia had not yet coalesced into one kingdom: ut in utroque plebe regum numeros nominaque suppleret electus (p. 363).

² Ang. Sac. ii. 83. The name of the mother was Ethelgive (sic erat nomen ignominiosæ mulieris.—MS. Cleop. p. 76).

³ Huic quædam natione præcelsa, inepta

of his cloister.¹ But Ethelgive was still at hand to keep alive the displeasure of her lover; a remonstrance addressed to the king by Archbishop Odo was attributed to the suggestion of Dunstan, and a resolution was taken to close at once the mouth of this importunate monitor. At first his monks were urged to rebel against him. The attempt failed. A party of thanes next entered his domain in hostile array, drove off the cattle, and plundered the abbey. Dunstan escaped; but it was in vain that he sought an asylum among his friends, his footsteps were traced from place to place, and so keen was the pursuit, that the ship which bore him from England was still in sight, when his enemies appeared on the beach, with orders, it was said, to deprive him of his eyes.² He reached in safety the coast of Flanders, was received with hospitality by the Earl Arnulf, and retired to the monastery of St. Peter's, in Ghent. His two abbeys of Glastonbury and Abingdon were dissolved by Edwy, and the few monks, whom he had collected and formed with the view of resuscitating the order, were dispersed among their friends and relatives.

It is unfortunate that we know not the chronological order of the events which happened during the reign of Edwy. If we may believe a very ancient writer, the king in his second, perhaps his third year, was prevailed upon to marry; but at the same time he kept a mistress, whom he had carried off by force, and whom he had placed for security in one of the royal villas. The scandal became public, and the archbishop, being informed of the fact, proceeded suddenly to the villa, took possession of the female, and sent her under an escort out of the kingdom. To Edwy he undertook to justify this bold proceeding, and with mild and parental language exhorted the young king to reform his conduct.³ But adversity proved a more efficacious monitor than the archbishop. Edwy had abandoned himself to the counsels of men, who, to secure his favour, pandered to his passions. All persons of his kindred were removed from court; of many thanes the lands were plundered by his direction; of others, the inheritances were seized; every order of men suffered from illegal exactions; and his grandmother, Eadgive, a princess revered for her age, rank, and character by the whole nation, was deprived by him of all her property.⁴ At length the Mercians rose in arms against him, and Edwy fled for his life.⁵ According to some Anglo-Norman writers, Ethelgive—factis, ut ab impiis actibus custodiret se, &c.—MS. Nero, E. 1 b.

¹ This was probably some months after the coronation; for in 956 he signs an undoubted charter of Edwy, with the title of dogmatista (Cod. Dipl. ii. 326); but this is the last time. His name is not to be found to any of the following charters of Edwy, though they are numerous.

² Ut ferunt, oculos illius, si in his maris littoribus inveniretur, eruendo dempsissent.—MS. Cleop. 77. Si comprehendi valeret, sine ullo respectu misericordiæ oculos ei erui præcepit.—Eadmer, apud Sur. 237. Parentela mulieris prosequens Sancti oculos erueri disponebat.—Wallingford, 543.

³ Rex sub uxore propria alteram adamavit quam et rapuit..... Antistes autem Phineatio zelo stimulatus et ira Dei irritatus, repente cum sociis equum ascendit, et ad villam qua mulier mansitabat pervenit, eamque rapuit, et de regno perduxit, regemque dulcibus admonuit verbis pariterque

⁴ Unde quid mali succerevit, quam infamis fama populorum aures et ora repleverit, facile est et me tacente videre. Ipse namque possessiones plurimorum diripere, hos et illos exhereditare, majores natu proscribere, totumque regnum innumeris oppressionibus conturbare festinavit.—Apud Eadmer. in Vit. S. Dunstani, 236. Col. Agrip. 1618. Accessit his malis ejus nimis detestabile malum. Matrem quippe totius Angliæ nobilitatricem, ecclesiarum consolatricem, et sustentatricem oppressorum—in immensum afflixit, ac vastatis rebus ad ipsam pertinentibus, ab eo statu in quo esse solebat, sævus et crudelis dejecit.—Ead. ibid. Atavam suam prædari præcepit.—MS. Cleop. 78. Eadgive states the same in her charter published by Lye.—Lye, App. iv.

⁵ Factum est ut in prætereuntibus annis

whether they mean the female mentioned in the history of his coronation, or some other of the same name—accompanied him in his flight, but was surprised by his pursuers, and cruelly put to death.¹ The king had the good fortune to cross the Thames, and to save himself in Wessex. The Mercians chose his brother Edgar for their king; and the men of Kent and Wessex, unwilling to prolong a civil and disastrous contest for his sake, assented to a general meeting of thanes from both nations, in which it was determined that the Thames should form the boundary between the separate dominions of the two brothers. Edwy governed his portion in peace, and to the satisfaction of his subjects, but died prematurely in 959 or 960.²

To account for the revolution which transferred the sceptre of Mercia from the hands of Edwy to those of Edgar, modern writers have set aside the authority of the original historians, and supplied its place with conjectures of their own. By one we are told that Dunstan, panting for revenge, hastened from Flanders, and intrigued with the northern thanes; by another, that the monks of Mercia, fearing the same fate which had befallen their brethren in Wessex, preached up the duty of revolt; by a third, that the insurrection was owing to the political influence of Archbishop Odo. But not one of these fictions can bear the test of inquiry. It is certain that Dunstan did not leave the place of his banishment till after the partition of the kingdom between the two brothers; that there existed no Benedictine monastery in Mercia, on which Edwy could wreak his vengeance, and that Odo, with the men of Kent, among whom his influence chiefly lay, continued the faithful subject of that prince, constantly attending his court, and subscribing to his charters till 959. If Edwy forfeited the crown of Mercia, it was owing to his own lawless and oppressive conduct, which was not confined to a few monks, but extended to his grandmother, his kindred, the friends of his late uncle, and the principal thanes of his kingdom.

EDGAR.

Edgar was still in the cradle, when he lost his mother Elfgiva. By his father the infant was intrusted to the care of Alfwena, the wife of Athelstan, an East-Anglian ealdorman, who from his royal descent and extensive authority had obtained the surname of the "half-king." The young prince was educated with their children; and was, it is probable, indebted to the family for his elevation to the throne of Mercia, in opposition to his brother Edwy. Athelstan, a little before his death, entered the monastery of Glastonbury; his four sons, Ethelwold, Alfwold, Athelsin, and Ailwin, long continued to be the favourite counsellors of Edgar.³

One of the first measures of the new king, or rather of his ministers (for he was only in his fourteenth year), was to recall from exile the abbot of Glastonbury. His possessions, which lay in the dominions of Edwy, he could not recover; but he was retained in an honourable situation at court near the person of Edgar. When the witan assembled, he opened the session with a discourse, which excited the admiration of his hearers; received at their unanimous penitus a brumali populo relinqueretur contemptus, quum in commisso regimine insipienter egisset, sagaces et sapientes odio vanitatis disperdens, et ignaros quosque sibi similes studio dilectionis adsciscens.—MS. Cleop. 78.

¹ Ang. Sac. ii. 106.

² Sicque universo populo testante publicas regum ex definitione sagacium segregatas, ut famosum flumen Tamense regnum disterneret amborum.—MS. Cleop. 78.

³ Hist. Rames. 387, 393.

request the episcopal consecration ; and on the death of the bishop of Worcester, was appointed successor to that prelate. The next year the church of London became vacant ; and he accepted, though with reluctance, the administration of that diocese.¹

The thanes of Wessex, after the death of Edwy, offered the throne to Edgar ; and the two kingdoms were again united under the same monarch. The oppressive acts of the late government were now solemnly annulled. Edgiva, the relict of Edward, recovered her patrimony ; Dunstan was re-established in the possession of Glastonbury and Abingdon ; and ample reparation was made to the thanes, who had suffered from the passion or resentment of Edwy.² One of the last acts of that prince had been to nominate Byrhtelm, bishop of Sherborne, to the metropolitical see of Canterbury. Perhaps the ministers of Edgar were unwilling to see a favourite of his brother at the head of the English church ; certain it is that in the assembly of the witan his want of vigour was alleged as a proof of incapacity ; and that Byrhtelm returned with disgrace to the church, from which he had been promoted. Dunstan, who was selected in his place, repaired to Rome, and obtained the pallium from John XII. He resigned the bishopric of London in favour of Ælfstan, that of Worcester in favour of Oswald, the nephew of Odo.³

Edgar has received from posterity the surname of "the Peaceful." During the sixteen years of his reign he was never compelled to unsheath the sword against either a foreign or a domestic enemy. The circumstance is the more remarkable, if we consider the lot of the kings who preceded, or followed him. His predecessors, during the long lapse of one hundred and fifty years, scarcely enjoyed an interval of repose from the repeated, and often formidable, invasions of the Northmen. Of his successors, his son was driven by them into Normandy ; his grandson was compelled to share the throne with a foreign chieftain ; and his descendants in the third degree lived in exile, while the English sceptre was wielded by a race of Danish sovereigns. This long interval of tranquillity, the peculiar felicity of Edgar, arose partly from the policy of his uncle Edred, partly from his own good fortune and the vigour of his councils.

The population of Northumbria was composed in a great proportion of Danes, or the posterity of Danes. Animosity against their southern neighbours, and affection for their own kinsmen, induced them frequently to invite, always to assist, the invaders. By Edred, indeed, they had been completely subdued ; but it is probable that their submission would only have been temporary, had not circumstances connected their interests with the prosperity of the new king. Edgar had been educated among the Danes of East Anglia ; the Northumbrians had united with that people and the Mercians to raise him to the throne ; and they respected him as a king whom they had not only chosen for themselves, but had imposed on the hostile kingdom of Wessex. He, whether it were through gratitude or policy, paid to them on all occasions the most marked attention ; and the only blot which the southern annalists could discover in his character, was his partiality for the manners, and his zeal for the wel-

¹ MS. Cleop. 78, 79. Osbern, 107. Walingford, 544.

² MS. Cleop. 79.

³ MS. Cleop. 79. Osb. 109. Wharton (Ang. Sac. ii. 197, not.) infers from the words of Osbern (p. 110), that Dunstan possessed Rochester with Canterbury. This is a mistake. Osbern says the contrary. So also does Eadmer, 214.

authority, though it was received with gratitude by his contemporaries, has been marked with unmerited censure by modern writers. The Danish invasion had both relaxed the sinews of ecclesiastical discipline, and dissolved the greater number of the monastic and clerical establishments. The most opulent monasteries had been laid in ruins by the rapacity of the barbarians: and their lands, without an owner, had been seized by the crown, or had been divided among the nearest and most powerful thanes. Under former kings, efforts had been made to restore the monastic order, but they had proved ineffectual. The prejudices against it were nourished by the great proprietors now in possession of its ancient revenues; even the monastery of Ethelinge, which Alfred had peopled with foreign monks, had been gradually deserted; and the two abbeys of Glastonbury and Abingdon, the fruits of the zeal of Dunstan, had been dissolved by the resentment of Edwy. The clerical order was more fortunate. Though shattered and disfigured, it had survived the tempest. But the friends of religious severity, when they compared the clergy of their day with the clergy of ancient times, saw much in their conduct to lament and correct. Formerly they lived in communities under particular regulations: and their seclusion from temporal pursuits insured the faithful discharge of their spiritual functions. But during the Danish wars they had been dispersed amidst their relatives, had divided among themselves the revenues of their respective churches, and, substituting others for the performance of the service, indulged in the pleasures and dissipation of the laity. But that which gave particular offence to the more devout was their marriages. It is most certain, that during the first two centuries of the Saxon church the profession of celibacy was required from every clergyman advanced to the orders of priest, or deacon, or sub-deacon:¹ but amid the horrors of successive invasions the injunctions of the canons had been overlooked or contemned; and, on many occasions, necessity compelled the prelates to ordain, for the clerical functions, persons who had already engaged in the state of matrimony. Similar causes had produced similar effects in the maritime provinces of Gaul: and Dunstan had witnessed, during his exile, the successful efforts of the abbot Gerard to restore the ancient discipline in the churches of Flanders.² Animated by his example, the metropolitan made a first essay to raise the monastic establishments from their ruins; and his labours were zealously seconded by two active co-operators, the bishops Oswald and Ethelwold. The former governed the church of Worcester: the latter, his favourite disciple, had been placed at his request in the see of Winchester. To them Edgar was induced to sell, or grant, the lands of the monasteries, which had fallen to the crown; and of those which remained in the hands of individuals, a portion was recovered by purchase, and still more by the voluntary resignation of the possessors. Persons were soon found ready to embrace an institute recommended by the prelates, and sanctioned by the king: as fast as buildings could be erected, they were filled with colonies of monks and their novices; and within a few years the great abbeys of Ely, Peterborough, Thorney, and Malmsbury, rose from their ashes, and recovered the opulence and the splendour which they had formerly enjoyed.

¹ Bed. i. 27; v. 21. Wilk. Con. p. 112, 133, 134, 136.

² Vita Sancti Gerardi, sec. v. Bened. p. 272.

The next object of the metropolitan was the reformation of the more dissolute among the clergy, principally in the two dioceses of Winchester and Worcester. For this purpose a commission was obtained from Rome; and a law was enacted, that every priest, deacon, and subdeacon should live chastely, or be ejected from his benefice.¹ Oswald, whose zeal was tempered with lenity, soon converted the canons of his cathedral and of Winchelcomb into communities of monks. Ethelwold met with a more stubborn resistance; and after a considerable delay was compelled to recur to the civil magistrate. Armed with the royal authority, he successively transferred the prebendaries to other situations which he had prepared for them in his diocese,² and supplied their places with monks whom he had selected from his favourite convent at Abingdon. There was nothing now to arrest the progress of monachism. The laity had caught the spirit of the prelates: several opulent noblemen erected monasteries on their respective demesnes; and the king publicly gloried in the assertion, that though the order was nearly extinct at his accession, almost fifty abbeys had been established during his reign.³

It was the pride of Edgar to display his opulence and authority; to be surrounded by prelates, nobles, and the princes his vassals; and to distribute among them presents of greater or less value in proportion to their respective ranks. Hence it will excite surprise that a prince of this character, living in an age which attached so much importance to the regal unction, should have permitted thirteen years of his reign to elapse before he was crowned: nor is it less extraordinary that, of the many historians who relate the circumstance, not one has thought proper to assign the reason. The ceremony was at length performed at Bath with the usual solemnity, and in the presence of an immense concourse of spectators (11 May, 973). Thence he proceeded on board the fleet, and after a long cruise repaired to Chester to receive the homage of eight princes, Kenneth, king of Scotland, his son Malcolm of Cumberland, Mac Orric of Anglesey and the isles, Jukil of Westmoreland, Jago of Galloway, and Howel, Dyfnwal, and Griffith of Wales. The ceremony was opened with a splendid procession by water on the Dee. Edgar stepping into his barge seated himself at the helm: and the vassal kings taking the oars rowed him to the church of St. John the Baptist; the prelates and thanes followed in their barges, while the banks were lined with spectators and the air resounded with acclamations. At his return he is said to have observed to those around him: "My successors may think themselves kings, when

¹ Eadmer, 200. Wilk. Con. 239, 247. I have omitted the celebrated speech attributed to Edgar on this occasion, because it is probably a declamation composed by some rhetorician.

² We are told that some of the ejected prebendaries reclaimed the lands of which they had been deprived; that in a council at Winchester, Dunstan was inclined, at the prayer of the king and nobility, to allow them another trial; but that he was deterred by a supernatural voice from a crucifix, saying—"Make no change. Your former decision was right." I mention this fable, because it occupies a prominent place in most modern histories, but is not to be found in any Anglo-Saxon writer, not even in Bridferth's contemporary Life of St. Dunstan, or Wulfstan's Life of St. Ethelwold. We are indebted for it to writers after the Conquest.

³ Chron. Sax. 117. Ingulf, 45, 47. Osborn, 111. Wolstan, Vit. Ethelwoldi, 814. Ead. 200. Hist. Rames. 400. The rule observed in all these monasteries was that of St. Benedict, with the addition of a few national customs.—Apost. Bened. App. par. 3, p. 80. The Benedictine monks were first introduced among the Northumbrians in 681 (Edd. Vit. Wilf. xlv.), among the West Saxons in 675 (Malm. de Pont. v. 344, 353, 356), and among the Mercians in 708 (Wilk. Con. p. 71).

they can command the service of the like number of princes."¹

Edgar had happily no opportunity of acquiring military glory; but on one occasion he is said to have proved that he was not deficient in personal courage. Kenneth, alluding to his spare form and low stature, had said that it was a disgrace to so many brave men to obey the authority of a dwarf. The words were reported to the king, who, dissembling his anger, conducted Kenneth into a neighbouring wood, and bade him draw his sword, and learn who was the fitter to command the other. The king of Scots apologized for the jest, and disarmed his resentment.²

Edgar lived only two years after his coronation, and died in 975.³ Like the other princes of his family, he married at a very early age. His first wife, Elfeda the Fair, survived their union but two years, and left him a son, Edward, who succeeded him. By his second wife Elfrida, the daughter of Ordgar, earl of Devonshire, he had two sons, Edmund, who died in his infancy, and Ethelred, who ascended the throne after the murder of Edward. Most writers have contented themselves with telling us that the king married Elfrida after the death of Ethelwold, her first husband; but Malmsbury, on the faith of an ancient ballad, has transmitted to us a story probably invented by his enemies. According to this account, Elfrida was possessed, as the heroine of every romance should be, of unparalleled beauty and accomplishments. Edgar commissioned Ethelwold, the son of his foster-father Athelstan, and his favourite minister, to visit Ordgar, and report his opinion of the daughter. The heart of the ealdorman was captivated. He forgot his duty, wooed and married Elfrida, and on his return informed his master, that, though she might grace the house of a subject, she did not become the splendour of a throne. But the secret was quickly betrayed; it reached the ears of the king, and he announced to his astonished favourite that he intended to visit the bride. Ethelwold had now recourse to tears and entreaties. He disclosed to his wife the whole transaction, and conjured her to conceal her beauty from the eyes of the king. But Elfrida had ceased to love, and he appeared to her in the light of an enemy, since he had deprived her of a crown. She received the king in her gayest attire, and employed all her arts to engage his notice and win his affections. Edgar retired, convinced of the perfidy of his friend, and of the superior beauty of the lady. For a while he disguised his intentions, but took the opportunity, while they were hunting together in the forest of Wherwell, to run his spear through the body of Ethelwold. It is needless to add, that he married the widow.⁴

I should not have noticed this tale, so improbable in itself, and supported by such questionable evidence, had it not found a place in most of our

¹ Chron. Sax. 121. Mailros, 150. Flor. 607. West. 192.

² Malm. 32.

³ Chron. Sax. 122. The Chronicle has preserved parts of the poems made on the occasion. I shall offer a literal version of some passages to the curiosity of the reader. "Here ended his earthly joys Edgar England's king; and chose the light of another world, beauteous and happy. Here Edgar departed, the ruler of the Angles, the joy of the West Saxons, the defender of the Mercians. That was known afar among many nations. Kings beyond the baths of the sea-fowl worshipped him far and wide: they bowed to the king as one of their own kin. There was no fleet so proud, there was no host so strong, as to seek food in England, while this noble king ruled the kingdom. He reared up God's honour, he loved God's law, he preserved the people's peace, the best of all the kings that were before in the memory of man. And God was his helper: and kings and earls bowed to him: and they obeyed his will: and without battle he ruled all as he willed."—p. 118, 122.

⁴ Chron. Sax. 124. Malm. i. 258. Flor. 608. Hunt. 204. Mailros, 151.

modern histories. There is another, which is better authenticated, and attributes to Edgar the violation of Wulfrith, a young lady educated in the convent of Wilton, who to elude his pursuit, had covered herself with the veil of one of the sisters. She bore him a daughter, Editha, afterwards abbess of Wilton. For this offence the king was severely reprov'd by the archbishop, and submitted to a course of penance during the term of seven years.

EDWARD THE MARTYR.

It was unfortunate that the two sons of Edgar were children at the time of their father's death. Edward had reached his thirteenth, Ethelred only his seventh year. There could be no doubt of Edward's claim to the crown; the right of primogeniture, the will of his father, and the extreme youth of his brother, all pleaded in his favour. Yet his succession was opposed by a party, who objected to his character, that he was of a harsh and cruel disposition; and to his birth, that he was born before either his father or mother had been crowned. At the head of the faction was Elfrida, whose ambition hoped to obtain the sceptre for her own son, and who, to strengthen his interests, openly proclaimed herself the patroness of the ejected clergy. The pretensions of Ethelred were espoused by them, by their numerous partisans, and in particular by Alfre, the powerful earl of Mercia; while, on the other hand, all the prelates, and the earls of Essex and East Anglia, maintained with equal obstinacy the superior claim of Edward. The controversy threatened to involve the nation in the horrors of civil war. Alfre wrested from the monks their new establishments in Mercia; Osac of Northumbria was driven by his enemies into exile; and Alfwine and Alfwold armed the East Anglians in their own defence. At length a general meeting of the witan was held; and Dunstan so victoriously proved the right of Edward, that he was chosen king without further opposition, and was crowned with the usual solemnity.¹

The young prince did not sway the sceptre four years. His constitution and his virtues promised a long and prosperous reign; the ambition of Elfrida cut short his days, and blasted the hopes of his subjects. One morning as he was hunting, he stopped at Corfe Castle, in Dorsetshire, the residence of his stepmother. While the unsuspecting prince was in the act of drinking a cup of mead on horseback, he was stabbed in the belly by an assassin. He immediately put spurs to his horse, but his bowels protruding from the wound, he sank from his seat, and was dragged by the stirrup. His servants following the track of his blood, found him breathless, and buried him privately at Wareham (18 March, 978). A few years later, Dunstan and Alfre took up his remains, and interred them with royal magnificence at Shaftesbury.²

During his reign happened the tragic catastrophe at Calne, which has furnished some historians with a pretext for accusing the primate of impiety and murder. According to some Anglo-Norman historians, on the death of certain of the ejected prebendaries of Winchester, their heirs advanced a claim to the lands, of which the prebendaries had been deprived; and retained at a great expense a celebrated orator, named Beornhelm, to plead their cause.³ It was heard before the king and witan at Calne, when Dunstan, if we may believe modern writers, had the impudence to fabricate a miracle in defence of the monks. By his orders, as they tell us, the floor of the room, destined to contain the members of the council, was loosened from the walls; during the deliberation, the temporary supports were removed; and while the primate was secure in his seat above, the rest of the assembly were precipitated to the ground. Yet if we divest the fact of its modern embellishments, it will be reduced to this: that the floor sank under the accumulated weight of the crowd; and that the archbishop had the good fortune to support himself by a beam, whilst of the others some were killed, and many were hurt by the fall.¹ More than this was unknown to any ancient historian; the contrivance and object ascribed to Dunstan are the fictions of recent historians.

¹ Chron. Sax. 123. Mailros, 151. Ingulf, 54. Hist. Rames. 142, 413. Malm. 39.

² Chron. Sax. 124, 125. Ing. 54. Malm. 34. Langtoft, p. 629, edit. Hearne.

³ These Anglo-Norman historians are Osborn and Eadmer, who wrote from documents, which, on their own showing, were far from authentic.—Ang. Sax. ii. 88, 211.

ETHELRED.

Elfrida now reaped the harvest of her crimes and ambition. By the death of Edward there remained but one prince of the blood royal; and the absence of other claimants compelled the prelates and thanes, though with no small reluctance, to bestow the crown on the son of the murderess.² The ceremony was performed at Kingston, on the Sunday after Easter (14 April, 978); and the following is the oath which was administered to the king by Archbishop Dunstan, previously to the coronation. "In the name of the most holy Trinity I promise, first, that the church of God and all Christian people shall enjoy true peace under my government; secondly, that I will prohibit all manner of rapine and injustice to men of every condition; thirdly, that in all judgments I will cause equity to be united with mercy, that the most clement God may, through his eternal mercy, forgive us all. Amen."³

Ethelred was only ten years of age, handsome in person, and amiable in disposition. But his spirit had been broken by the violence and barbarity of his mother. When he wept at the untimely death of Edward, she considered his tears a reproach to herself, and punished him so severely, that his life was thought to be in danger. But as he advanced in age, her influence gradually declined; and she at last bade farewell to the court, and built the two monasteries of Ambresbury and Whorwel. In one of these she spent the remainder of her days, bewailing her past misconduct, and

Both agree that the controversy at Calne concerned only the children of the deceased prebendaries of Winchester. Per successionem filiorum (Osb. 112). Illis huic vitæ subtractis filii eorum cupientes recuperare quæ perdidérant in parentibus suis (Eadm. 220). I mention this because it is customary to represent the cause heard at Calne as the cause of the whole body of ejected clergy. The expelled clergy, says Dr. Lappenberg, had fled to Scotland, and now brought back with them from that country the excellent Scottish bishop Beornhelm for the purpose of aiding them with his talents against Dunstan.—Thorpe's Lappenberg, ii. 146. Beornhelm is an Anglo-Saxon name. How he came to be a Scottish or Irish bishop is unknown. Eadmer says: Scotiam miserunt, et inde quendam prægrandis, ut fama ferebat, eloquentis virum, Beornelimum nomine, magno conductum pretio adduxerunt.—Ang. Sax. ii. 220. The claimants were the sons of the prebendaries ejected from Winchester, and pretended an hereditary right to the lands formerly held by their fathers.

¹ Chron. Sax. 124. Malm. 84. Flor. 608. Hunt. 204. Mail. 151.

² A weak attempt was made to raise an opposition in favour of Editha, the natural daughter of Edgar by Wulfrith. She herself rejected the offer.—Vit. S. Eadgithæ, in Act. SS. Bened. p. 638.

³ Hick. Gram. præf.—MS. Claud. A. 3. It is in substance the same oath which had long been taken by Christian kings among the northern nations.—See Martene, ii. 188, 197, 199, 211.

endeavouring to atone for the scandal which she had given, by the publicity of her repentance.¹

The reign of her son was long and unfortunate. Though guiltless himself, he enjoyed the benefit of Edward's murder, and, on that account, appeared on the throne stained with the blood of an elder and unoffending brother. Even in his youth he did not possess the affection of his subjects; during his manhood, he incurred their hatred by his apathy for their sufferings, his disinclination for business, and his immoderate love of pleasure. The northern pirates, who had long respected the coasts of England, soon discovered the distracted state of the kingdom; the depredations of the last century were renewed with still greater success; and, as if heaven had conspired with men to avenge the blood of Edward, the horrors of invasion were aggravated by several years of scarcity, by a contagious distemper among the cattle, and a dysentery most fatal to the human species. It would be difficult to select a period in English history, in which the nation was visited with such a multiplicity of calamities, as during the protracted reign of Ethelred.²

The profession of piracy among the Northmen had, in the last century, received many considerable checks. The vigilance with which the coasts of Gaul and Britain were guarded had diminished the chances of success: the more opulent adventurers, willing to enjoy the fruits of their plunder, sought to excite a spirit of industry among their countrymen; and powerful princes had arisen, who, for their own security, laboured to put down the faithless and ferocious sea-kings. A few chieftains, however, still followed the example of their fathers; and one of these rovers in 980, ventured to make a descent near Southampton. His temerity was rewarded with an ample booty. With similar success he repeated the attempt on the Isle of Thanet; and in succeeding years the coasts of Cornwall and Devonshire, then the Isle of Portland, afterwards Watchet in Somersetshire, were successively visited and plundered by the barbarians. These, indeed, were but momentary inroads. They might harass, they could not alarm. But in 991 a more formidable armament under Justin and Gurthmund reduced Ipswich. Thence the Northmen proceeded as far as Malden, to meet the ealdorman Brithnoth, who had formerly gained a splendid victory on the same spot, and whom they now challenged a second time to the combat. Accompanied by his retainers, Brithnoth hastened to oppose the enemy. As he passed by Ramsey, the abbot Wulfsig invited him to dinner with seven of his thanes. "Go, tell thy master," replied the chief to the messenger, "that as I cannot fight, so I will not dine without my followers." From Ramsey he proceeded to Ely, where his little army was hospitably received by the monks. In the morning he entered the chapter-house, and made to them the gift of several manors, on condition that if it were his lot to fall in the battle, he should be buried by them in their church. For fourteen days he foiled all the attempts of the Danes: but in the last engagement his followers rushed with blind impetuosity on the multitude of their enemies. It was the combat of despair against numbers. Brithnoth fell: his head was conveyed to Denmark by the invaders as the trophy of victory, the trunk was found by the monks of Ely, and interred within their church. To preserve the memory of her husband, his widow Ethelfleda embroidered on silk the history of his exploits, which she suspended over his tomb: a more lasting memorial was raised by the genius of an Anglo-Saxon scop, whose poem on the valour and patriotism of Brithnoth has been lately published.¹

¹ Malm. 34. West, ad ann. 978.

² Chron. Sax. 125. Ing. 55, 56. Malm. 34.

The ravages committed by the Danes on the defenceless inhabitants of the sea-coast suggested the idea of purchasing their forbearance by the offer of a sum of money; and Siric, archbishop of Canterbury, with the ealdormen Æthelweard and Ælfric, having obtained the royal permission, paid to them a contribution of £10,000, to secure from hostility the several districts, which they governed "under the king's hand." This led to a more comprehensive treaty made by Ethelred, and "all his witan," with the army under Anlaf (Olave), and Justin, and Guthmund, the son of Stetiga. According to the original document, it was mutually agreed that worldly frith or peace should thenceforth exist between the two parties; that the strangers should aid the king and his subjects against every naval armament which might commit hostilities on the English coast, and the natives should supply the strangers with provisions as long as they were in the king's service. That neither party should give harbour to refugees from the other, whether the latter were slaves, or malefactors, or foemen; that if an individual of one nation was slain by one of the other nation, the slayer should either be delivered up, or should pay a compensation of thirty pounds, if the slain were a freeman, of one pound, if he were a slave, and that if, in an affray, either within or without a borough, more than one person were slain, the compensation should be made as above, but if the number of the slain amounted to eight, it should be considered a breach of the grith, and the public force should be employed to seize the perpetrators alive or dead, or "their nearest kindred, head for head." For this treaty the Danes are said to have received twenty-two thousand pounds, which sum may perhaps include the ten thousand already mentioned.²

From this time we hear no more of Justin and Guthmund, who probably returned home with their followers: but it was plainly intended by the conditions of the treaty, that the adventurers should remain for some time in the English havens as Ethelred's allies; and that they should be permitted to mix on shore with the natives as friends under the king's peace. Whether their conduct during the winter called for revenge, or provoked suspicion, we are ignorant; but the next year a powerful fleet was prepared at London, and despatched under the ealdormen Ælfric and Thored, and the bishops Ælfstan and Æscwy, with secret orders to surprise and capture the Danish armament, as it lay at anchor in peace and security. But Ælfric, who was a traitor, and already leagued with the Northmen, joined them in the evening, informed them of the impending danger, and urged them to immediate flight. In the pursuit Ælfric's vessel was captured. The traitor himself had the fortune to escape: but the eyes of his son Algar were put out by the orders of Ethelred; either because the young man had been an accomplice in the treason, or because revenge impelled the king to punish the guilt of the father on his guiltless offspring.³

In the following year the Danes

¹ See Thorpe's Analecta, p. 121.

² See the treaty in Thorpe's Institutes, &c. i. 284–288; vii. That it should be referred to this year is plain, because Justin and Guthmund, the son of Stetiga, were the leaders of the Danes who fought against Brithnoth (Hov. f. 245, b.); and it was with these also that Siric, Æthelweard, and Ælfric made the agreement for 10,000*l.* - Chron. Sax.; Hoved.; and Hunt. ad ann. 991.

³ Chron. Sax. 127. Malm. 35. Flor.

transferred their arms from the south to the north of England. Bam-borough was carried by storm: the three chieftains appointed to command the natives, deserted to the invaders; and the coast on both sides of the Humber was successively ravaged by the barbarians. But in 994 two new, and more powerful leaders appeared; Sweyn, king of Denmark, and Olave, king of Norway. The former had mounted the throne by the murder of his father; had been twice expelled by the arms of Eric of Sweden; and had twice recovered his dominions. Olave was the son of Tryggva, a pirate by profession, who had repeatedly visited and pillaged the coasts of Ireland, Britain, and Normandy. From the Scilly isles, where a hermit induced him to embrace Christianity, he had sailed to the Orkneys; had subdued and converted the natives with the logic of his sword; and at his arrival on the coast of Norway had been unexpectedly hailed king by the chieftains who had deposed Hacon the Bad. A confederacy was formed between the Dane and the Norwegian, who with ninety-four ships sailed up the Thames, to attack the city of London. They were repulsed with considerable loss: but, to revenge their disappointment, they ravaged the neighbouring counties of Essex, Kent, Sussex, and Hampshire. Terror and distrust prevailed again in the councils of Ethelred. The invaders had mounted a body of horsemen to carry their devastations to a greater distance; the king, who dared not collect an army to oppose their excursions, offered them the sum of sixteen thousand pounds, and winter quarters at Southampton, as the price of their forbearance. The conditions were accepted. Olave accompanied the prelates Elphege and Ethelward to Andover; received from the bishop of Winchester the sacrament of confirmation; and promised the king that he would never more draw the sword against his Christian brethren. Sweyn, on the departure of his confederate, was compelled to follow him; but he never forgave what he deemed a breach of faith in the Norwegian. Olave employed his time in endeavouring to convert his subjects: and some years afterwards was surprised by Sweyn at sea near the islet of Wollin. Unable to contend with success against the multitude, and disdaining to surrender to his enemy, he terminated the unequal contest by leaping from his ship into the waves.¹

During the four following years, different parts of the coast were repeatedly laid waste by the pirates. At last in 998 Ethelred succeeded in collecting a powerful fleet and army; but the commanders, we are told, were secret friends of the Danes, who by their advice quitted the kingdom, and sailed to the mouth of the Seine. The king, unable to meet with the Northmen, led his troops the following year into Cumberland, which he almost desolated by his ravages, while his fleet, prevented by the weather from gaining the station assigned to it, sailed to the Isle of Man, and depopulated that nursery of pirates.²

In 1001 the Danes returned from Normandy. They landed in Hampshire; carried their devastations as far as the Bristol Channel, and retracing their steps passed to the Isle of Wight. In this expedition they had fought and gained two battles, and had reduced to ashes Waltham, Taunton, Pen, Clifton, and several smaller towns. The king could discover no better expedient than that of ransom, and the barbarians retired, on the payment of twenty-four thousand pounds.¹

¹ Chron. Sax. 127—129. Mail. 162. Sim. Dunel. 163. Sax. Gram. 184, 189. Snorre, 222, 345.

² Chron. Sax. 120, 130. Mail. 163. Fordun asserts that the Cumbrians had refused to pay their share of the Dane-gelt (iv. 35).

Ethelred, in the seventeenth year of his age, had married Elfreda, the daughter of the ealdorman Thored, who bore him six sons and four daughters. After her death, he obtained the hand of Emma, a Norman princess, who on her marriage assumed the name of Elgiva. The king and her father Richard had formerly been enemies. The origin of their quarrel is unknown, but Ethelred had prepared a fleet for the invasion of Normandy, and Richard had arrested all the English merchants and pilgrims in his dominions, thrown many into prison, and condemned several to death. Pope John XV. undertook to reconcile the two princes, and his legate Leo, the vice-bishop of Treves, visited first Ethelred, and then Richard. At his request they sent commissioners to Rouen; by whom it was agreed that all ancient causes of dissension should be forgotten; that a perpetual peace should subsist between the king of England and the marquess of Normandy, their children born and to be born, and all their true liegemen; that every infraction of this peace should be repaired by satisfactory compensation; and that neither prince should harbour the subjects nor the enemies of the other without a written permission. This, the oldest treaty now extant between any of our kings and a foreign power, is drawn up in the name of the pope, and confirmed by the oaths and marks of one bishop and two thanes on the part of Ethelred, and of one bishop and two barons on the part of Richard.² The king's union with a Norman princess was calculated to improve this friendship between the two nations, and to secure a powerful support against the Danes. But Ethelred's conduct marred his hopes. By his neglect of his young queen, and his repeated infidelities, he alienated her affections, and provoked the resentment of her brother, Richard II., who had succeeded his father in the dukedom.

Emma had reached England in the spring: but the rejoicings occasioned by the marriage were scarcely concluded when Ethelred planned and executed a measure, which will cover his name with everlasting infamy. In the beginning of November his officers, in the towns and counties, received from him secret orders to organize against a certain day a general massacre of the Danes within their respective jurisdictions. On the thirteenth of that month, the festival of St. Brice, the unsuspecting victims with their wives and families were seized by the populace, and the horror of the murder was in many places aggravated by every insult and barbarity which national hatred could suggest. At London they fled for security to the churches, and were massacred in crowds round the altars.

The most illustrious of the sufferers was Gunhilda, the sister of Sweyn, who had embraced Christianity, and had married Palig, a naturalized Northman. By the orders of the royal favourite, the infamous Edric, her children and husband were slaughtered before her eyes. In the agonies of death she is said to have foretold the severe revenge which her brother would one day inflict both on him who commanded, and on those who perpetrated the murder.³

Of the motives which prompted this bloody tragedy, and of the extent to which it was carried, we are ignorant. In all probability it was confined to the Danes who had settled in England

¹ Chron. Sax. 131, 132. Flor. 611.

² Malm. 35, 36. West. 196. The treaty was signed at Rouen, March 1st, 991.

Richard was called indifferently, marquess, or earl, or duke.

³ Malm. 35. Hunt. 206. West. 200, 201.

since the king's accession, among whom were chieftains, whom he had allured by grants of lands to his service, and inferior adventurers, who, in consequence of his frequent treaties with the invaders, had mixed with the natives, and remained among them under the protection of his grith or peace. Of the first class we know that Palig, though he had received a princely inheritance, and sworn allegiance to the English monarch, had joined his kinsman Sweyn in the last invasion; and it is probable that many others, both chieftains and private individuals, frequently acted in the same manner. Hence there can be no doubt that Ethelred had recourse to this dreadful expedient of a general massacre, as a punishment due to their past disloyalty, and a measure of precaution to prevent its recurrence on some subsequent occasion.¹

In the following spring Sweyn was again at sea with a powerful armament, and burning to avenge the blood of his sister and his countrymen.

By the negligence or perfidy of Hugo, the Norman governor appointed by Emma, he obtained possession of Exeter, and thence poured his barbarians into the heart of Wiltshire. A numerous army had been collected to oppose him under the command of Ælfric, who had again made his peace with the king; but the hoary traitor, by a counterfeit sickness, paralyzed the efforts of his followers; and Sweyn indulged without molestation in the pursuit of plunder and vengeance. During four years England presented the mournful spectacle of a nobility divided by faction, treason, and murder; of a king unequal to the duties of his station; and of a people the sport of an exasperated and vindictive enemy. If the winter afforded a pause from the horrors of war, the barbarians were always prepared to recommence their devastations in the spring; if a season of scarcity compelled them to retire for a while, they constantly reappeared with the following harvest. Each county was successively the scene of their ravages; and the natives who fell into their hands experienced every species of insult, of torment, and of death. Every village, town, and city was invariably given to the flames. There were indeed instances in which the despair of the inhabitants inflicted severe punishment on the invaders; but as often as the English armies ventured to oppose them in the open field, they were routed with the most dreadful slaughter. At length in 1007 Sweyn had quenched his thirst of revenge, and consented to a peace on the payment of thirty-six thousand pounds of silver.²

The enormous sums repeatedly given to the Danes had never purchased more than a temporary cessation of hostilities; and it was at last discovered that the riches of the nation might be more usefully employed in providing for its own defence, than in stimulating the rapacity of its enemies. In the witena-gemot it was determined to provide a formidable fleet, and armour for the mariners, by an assessment on all the landholders in the kingdom, and in the proportion of one ship for three hundred and ten hides, and of a helmet and breastplate for every eight hides. The next year the most numerous armament that ever rode in the English Channel, was collected at Sandwich. Ethelred himself, accompanied by his principal thanes, went on board; and every heart thrilled with the hope of victory. But this pleasing anticipation soon vanished in mistrust and disunion. Brihtric, the brother of Edric, lately appointed earl of Mercia, accused of treason Wulfnoth, the "child" of the South Saxons. That chieftain, either conscious of guilt, or indignant at the charge, separated from the fleet with twenty ships, and commenced the profession of a sea-king. Brihtric with eighty sail undertook to bring him back "alive or dead;" but his squadron was stranded by the fury of a tempest, and every vessel was burnt by the followers of Wulfnoth. This disaster increased the confusion of the royal councils; the most groundless suspicions were entertained; Ethelred hastily returned to land; and the mariners, abandoned by their captains, steered their course up the Thames.¹ The departure of the English was the signal for the re-appearance of the Danish fleet. It was no longer under the command of Sweyn, who pretended to observe his recent stipulations; but had secretly granted permission to Thurchil to revenge the death of his brother, who had perished in a former expedition.² For three years Thurchil carried fire and devastation into different parts of the kingdom. In the first he ravaged the southern counties; in the second he penetrated through East Anglia into the fens, which had hitherto afforded a secure asylum to the natives; in the third he besieged and destroyed the important city of Canterbury. Thurchil had lain before it twenty days, when the traitor Ælmer set fire to a number of houses; and while the inhabitants were employed in extinguishing the flames, the Northmen forced open one of the gates, and rushed into the city. Elphege, the archbishop, venerable for his age and virtues, threw himself into the midst of the carnage, and besought the barbarians to spare the inhabitants. He was seized, bound, and dragged to behold the fate of his cathedral, in which were collected the monks and the clergy, the women and the children. A pile of wood had been reared against the wall; with shouts of triumph the fire was kindled; the flames quickly ascended the roof; and as the melted lead and falling timbers compelled the fugitives to quit their retreat, they were successively massacred before the eyes of the primate. In the evening the Danes numbered eight hundred captives; seven thousand men besides women and children had perished in the sack of the city. The life of Elphege was spared during several weeks, in the hope that he might be induced to pay a ransom of three thousand pounds; but the old man refused to solicit the aid either of his friends or the clergy; and was put to death on the Saturday after Easter, while he was labouring to impress his captors with a reverence for the doctrines of Christianity. At last Thurchil, after ravaging the greater part of thirteen counties, sold his friendship and services to Ethelred for the sum of forty-eight thousand pounds. Many of his followers accepted settlements in the island; and the mariners of five-and-forty ships swore allegiance to the monarch.³

¹ Huntingdon's account is the most deserving of credit. Omnes Dacos, qui cum pace erant in Anglia fecit mactari; de quo scelere in pueritia nostra quosdam vetustissimos loqui audivimus, quod in unamquamque urbem rex occultas miserit epistolas,

secundum quas Angli Dacos omnes eodem die et eadem hora vel gladiis truncaverunt impremeditatos, vel igne cremaverunt simul comprehensos.—Hunt. ibid.

² Chron. Sax. 133—136.

Here the reader may pause to take a view of this fallen and devoted country. The natives had not submitted to their fate without a struggle; but numerous treasons and accumulated defeats had unnerved their courage; while repeated victories had inspired the Danes with the idea that ulcisceretur.—Ditmar apud Bouquet, x. 134.

¹ Chron. Sax. 137.

² Encom. Emmæ, Maseres, p. 7. Licentiâ accepta, fratrem suum inibi interfectum

³ Chron. Sax. 141, 142. Ang. Sac. ii. 135.

they were invincible. We are assured on good authority that one Northman was considered an equal match for ten Englishmen.¹ Hence we meet with few instances of successful defence, except in the fortified cities, which were seldom reduced. London, though repeatedly besieged, still bade defiance to all the power of the invaders.² But the open country was universally abandoned to their mercy, while they systematically destroyed whatever they could not carry away, and reduced to ashes every monastery, village, and town. In consequence of these ravages, the labours of agriculture were interrupted or abandoned; and in some years the scarcity was so great, that the Danes themselves were compelled to quit the island in search of provisions.³

These calamities sprung from the ferocity of the invaders; others must be attributed to the turbulence and insubordination of the natives. Since the death of Edgar the administration of justice had been but feebly enforced; of late it had been entirely suspended. The absence of legal punishment, and the license of a state of warfare, had left the passions of individuals without restraint; the most atrocious crimes were committed with impunity; and men sought to indemnify themselves for their own losses by the spoliation of their neighbours. On the one side relations were sold for slaves by their relations, children in the cradle by their parents; on the other, the slaves often rose on their masters, pillaged their property, and then deserted to the enemy.⁴ The thanes of each district adopted at last the general policy of the nation. Instead of uniting with their neighbours against the common enemy, they negotiated for their own security; and by the payment of a sum of money dismissed the barbarians to another county, to repeat the same ravages and extort similar contributions.⁵

To this period must also be referred the origin of direct and annual taxation. The sums which Ethelred so frequently paid to the Northmen were raised by an impost on landed property, which did not cease with the occasion, but was retained for centuries, under the pretext of providing for the defence of the kingdom.⁶ The assessments were at first apportioned with apparent equity, but they soon gave birth to much extortion, and consequently to much misery. Wherever money was known to exist, it was required by the king's officers, and the payment of one demand was considered sufficient evidence of ability to pay a second. By these repeated exactions, joined to the depredations of the enemy, the most opulent proprietors were often reduced to a state of penury. From one instance the reader may form an idea of the others. In 1005 Godric was chosen abbot of Croyland, and in that and the seven following years the monies levied on his monastery by the king, the ealdorman, and the inferior officers, amounted on an average to the annual sum of four hundred marks. In 1013 Sweyn plundered all the manors belonging to the abbey, and crowds of the natives, fleeing from the swords of the barbarians, sought an asylum at Croyland. The benevolent old man received them with open arms, consoled them in their misfortunes, and offered them support as long as his

¹ Serm. Lup. apud Hickes, 103.

² Chron. Sax. 138.

³ Chron. Sax. 134.

⁴ Serm. Lupi apud Hickes, Diss. epis. 99, 106. Langebeck, ii. 404, 409.

⁵ Chron. Sax. 134, 140, 141.

⁶ Hunting. v. f. 205. It was called Dane-geld, and became an annual land-tax of twelve-pence per hide. The clergy were exempted from it.—Leg. Sax. Ed. Con. xi. p. 193.

means sufficed. The choir and the cloisters he reserved for the accommodation of his own monks and those of the neighbourhood; the body of the church was allotted to the clergy for their residence; the laymen were lodged in the other apartments of the abbey, and the women and children in temporary buildings erected in the cemetery. The charity of Godric awakened the rapacity of Sweyn. Under pain of the demolition of the monastery he ordered the abbot to pay one thousand marks at Lincoln, on an appointed day, and not satisfied with this sum, extorted another thousand within the three following months. Scarcely were these demands satisfied, when the officers of Ethelred appeared. They accused Godric of being the confederate of Sweyn; the payment of the money extorted from him by violence was construed into an act of treason, and he was compelled to offer two thousand marks to the king to recover the royal favour. Harassed by these iniquitous proceedings, and reduced to a state of poverty, Godric, as a last resource, implored the protection of Norman, a powerful retainer of the ealdorman Edric, and that chieftain, in consideration of the grant of a valuable manor for the term of one hundred years, proclaimed himself the patron of the abbey, and engaged to defend it with his sword from every unjust demand.¹

Report had carried to Denmark the knowledge of Thurchil's success and of his subsequent engagement with Ethelred; and Sweyn, jealous of the reputation as well as the fidelity of that chieftain, summoned all his vassals to his standard, and openly declared his intention of attempting the conquest of England. The riches of the fleet, and the superior magnificence of the royal galley, are described in terms of admiration by a contemporary historian; nor shall we refuse credit to his narrative, if we recollect that Denmark had been for centuries the depot of successful depredation.² Sweyn sailed to Sandwich; was foiled in an attempt to corrupt the Danish mercenaries, and directed his course to the mouth of the Humber. At Gainsborough he received successively the submission of the Northumbrians, of the men of Lindesey, of the Five-burghers, and of the other inhabitants on the north of the Watling-street. They were partly incorporated with his troops, and were commanded to supply him with provisions and horses. As conquest was his object, he resolved to extort by terror the submission of the southern English; and the orders which he issued preparatory to his march, were congenial to the barbarism of the chief and his followers, to ravage the open country, pillage the churches, burn the towns, and put every male to the sword.³ From the Watling-street to the Thames these instructions were faithfully observed: the inhabitants of Oxford appeased his anger by prayers and hostages, their example was followed by the citizens of Winchester, and the invader, borne forward by the tide of success, hurried his troops to the walls of London. The city was defended by Ethelred and Thurchil, whose negotiations, policy, and courage baffled the stratagems and assaults of the enemy. Sweyn consoled his disappointment with the repetition of his former cruelties, and marching slowly to Bath, proclaimed himself king of England, summoned to his court the thanes of Wessex, Mercia, and Northumberland, and compelled them to swear allegiance to the king of the Danes. This general defection created

¹ Ingl. 55, 57.

² Encom. Emmæ, Maseres, p. 9. Vases in the shape of birds or dragons were fixed on the masts to point out the direction of the wind.—Ibid.

³ Flor. 614. West. 201.

alarm within the walls of the metropolis. The wavering fidelity of the citizens induced the king and Thurchil to retire with the fleet to Greenwich, and the authority of the invader was quickly established in London itself. In this emergency Ethelred yielded to despair. His wife and children, with a retinue of one hundred and forty horsemen, he recommended to the care of her brother Richard, and sailed clandestinely with the few thanes and prelates who still adhered to his fortunes, to the Isle of Wight. There he remained in concealment till a messenger from Emma brought him the offer of a secure asylum in Normandy.¹

The successes of the northern chieftains were often attended with surprising revolutions, and their thrones, which had no firmer basis than that of terror, were overturned at the first shock. It was in the second week of January that Ethelred fled from England, and abandoned the crown to his victorious competitor: in the first week of February the unexpected death of that competitor recalled the fugitive king, and re-established his authority. Sweyn, before he died, had appointed his son Canute to succeed him, and the will of the monarch had been confirmed by the acclamations of the army.² But the English, no longer overawed by the genius of the conqueror, and considering the moment favourable for the recovery of their independence, invited Ethelred to re-ascend the throne. His son Edward met the thanes at London; it was agreed that the king should forgive all past offences, should govern according to law, and should on important occasions follow the advice of the great council, and that the thanes, on their part, should swear to support his authority, and never submit to a Danish sovereign. Ethelred, who returned about the middle of Lent, was received with enthusiasm, and instantly led an army against the enemy in Lindesey. Canute could not withstand the superior force of the English, and fled with sixty ships, leaving his associates to the mercy of the victors. The country was ravaged, and every inhabitant of Danish extraction was put to the sword. To revenge the fate of his friends, Canute ordered the hostages, who had been delivered to his father, to be deprived of their ears, noses, and hands. In this mutilated state, the sons of the noblest families among the English were landed at Sandwich, as pledges of that unsparing retribution which awaited those who had revolted from the authority, or opposed the interests, of the Dane. He proceeded to his own country.³

It might have been expected that the English, relieved from the pressure of the enemy, would have employed this interval in providing against future dangers. But distrust and treachery still distracted their attention, and divided their councils. Ethelred convoked an assembly of the witan at Oxford; and his first measure was a repetition, on a smaller scale, of that system of massacre, for which he had already suffered so severely. Many thanes of Danish descent were immolated to his jealousy or revenge; but Sigferth and Morcar, the chieftains of the Seven-burghers, were too powerful to be openly assailed with impunity. On such occasions the policy of the king did not disdain the dagger of the assassin. The unsuspecting earls were invited to a banquet by his favourite Edric, and in the midst of the feast were murdered by a body of armed men. Their retainers, alarmed at the fate of their lords, fled to the church of St. Frideswitha; driven from the gates, they sought refuge in the tower; but Ethelred, irritated by their resistance, ordered fire to be put to the sacred edifice; and had the satisfaction to see his enemies, real or supposed, perish in the conflagration. Such conduct was not of a nature to conciliate esetem, or to insure fidelity. The sequel proved that he could not command the obedience even of his own family. Edmund, his eldest son, petitioned for the possessions of the two earls. The father refused; and the young prince hastened to Malmesbury, married Algiva, the relict of Sigeferth, whom the king had confined in the monastery, rode with her into Northumberland, and by her influence prevailed on the Seven-burghers to receive him as their chieftain. Ethelred was compelled to acquiesce in this insult to his authority.¹

¹ Chron. Sax. 143, 144. Malm. 39. West. 202.

² Encom. Emm. p. 9.

³ Chron. Sax. 145. Flor. 615. Hunt. 207.

At the commencement of winter Thurchil had received twenty-one thousand pounds as the reward of his past services: but either suspecting the capricious temper of Ethelred, or dreading the resentment of his native sovereign, he returned with nine sail to Denmark, and obtained, after much solicitation, the forgiveness of Canute. The thousand ships which, according to the northern writers, that prince had collected for the invasion of England, are reduced to two hundred by a contemporary historian: but he describes in pompous colours, the splendour of their equipment, and assures us that among the warriors whom they bore, there was not one of ignoble birth, or past the age of manhood, or unpractised in feats of arms, or unable to contend in speed with the fleetest horse.² Sandwich was at this period "the most celebrated haven in Britain."³ Here Thurchil solicited and obtained permission to obliterate the disgrace of his past disloyalty. He was the first to land; but was resolutely opposed; and if he ultimately proved successful, it was not without the loss of the bravest among his Danes. From Sandwich Canute proceeded along the southern coast, ravaged the maritime counties, and extorted the submission of the West Saxons. An army had been collected in the north by Edmund; another in Mercia by Edric. They joined, quarrelled, and separated. The resentment of Edric led him to the standard of Canute; and his example was followed by a body of Danes, who had sworn fealty to Ethelred.⁴

The next year, after an ineffectual attempt to raise an army in the southern counties, Edmund put himself at the head of the Northumbrians, who had been called into the field by their earl Uhtred. England soon became the prey of two hostile armies, which, instead of seeking each other, contented themselves with plundering the defenceless inhabitants. The royalists wreaked their vengeance on the counties of Stafford, Salop, and Leicester, the inhabitants of which had refused to join their standard; and Canute, adopting a similar policy, indulged his followers with the pillage of the eastern part of Mercia, and the neighbourhood of York. Uhtred was called away to protect his own property: but finding resistance hope-

¹ Chron. Sax. 146. Malm. 39. Flor. 616. West. 202. The Five-burghers, or inhabitants of the five burghs, Leicester, Stamford, Derby, Nottingham, and Lincoln, are well known in our history. But who were the Seven-burghers? Probably the same, with the addition of Chester and York.

² Encom. Emm. 12. Langebeck, i. 67, 118.

³ Sandwich omnium Anglorum portuum famosissimus.—Encom. Emm. 13, 14.

⁴ Forty ships.—Chron. Sax. 146. Flor. 616. The amount of the Danish armies is always calculated by our old writers in ships. From different hints I conjecture the complement of a ship to have been about eighty men.

less, made an offer of submission. It was accepted; and his oath of fealty was followed by an order for his execution. The Dane summoned him to attend his court at Wiheal: a curtain suspended across the hall concealed Thurebrand and a body of assassins; and the defenceless earl fell a victim to the perfidy of his new sovereign. Forty of his retainers shared his fate.¹

Harassed with care, and worn out with disease, Ethelred had resigned the defence of the throne to the courage and activity of Edmund. At the arrival of Canute, from Denmark, the king lay confined to his bed at Cosham, in Wiltshire. For greater security he was then removed to London, where he lingered through the winter. But his constitution was broken; and on the twenty-third of April he terminated a long and calamitous reign at the very moment when the barbarians were preparing to besiege him in his capital. Of the sons by his first wife, Edmund, Edwy, and Athelstan survived him: by Emma he left two others, Edward and Alfred.²

EDMUND.

If the personal exertions of an individual could have prevented the subjugation of England, that glorious achievement would have been accomplished by the courage and perseverance of Edmund. He was in London at the time of his father's death, and was immediately proclaimed king by the citizens. Canute was posted at Southampton, where the thanes of Wessex reluctantly acknowledged him for their sovereign. The preparations for the siege of the capital, the last bulwark of English independence, were now ready; and a fleet of three hundred and forty sail, carrying an army of twenty-seven thousand men, had been collected in the mouth of the Thames.³ Within the city were Edmund and his brother, the queen-dowager Emma, two bishops, and several distinguished thanes. It was easy for Canute to cut off the commu-

¹ Chron. Sax. 147, 148. Malm. 40. Encom. Emm. 15. The history of Uhtred and his family will afford striking proofs of the barbarism of the times. When Malcolm, king of Scotland, laid siege to Durham, Uhtred assumed the office of his aged father, the Earl Waltheof, and defeated the enemy. After the victory he selected the most handsome of the slain, whose heads by his orders were cut off, washed in the river, and with their long braided hair fixed on stakes round the walls of the city. To reward this service Ethelred appointed him earl, and gave him his daughter Elfgiva in marriage. His former wife Siga was the daughter of the opulent thane Styrr. With her he had espoused the quarrels of the family, and engaged to satisfy the revenge of his father-in-law by the death of that nobleman's enemy Thurebrand. But Thurebrand frustrated all his machinations, and at last, as appears above, obtained the consent of Canute to inflict on his foe the punishment which had been designed for himself. The murderer, however, fell soon after by the sword of Aldred, the son of the man whom he had murdered. The duty of revenge now devolved on Ceorl, the son of Thurebrand. The two chieftains spent some years in plotting their mutual destruction: by the persuasion of their friends they were reconciled; and the reconciliation was confirmed by oaths of brotherhood, and a promise of making together a pilgrimage to Rome. Aldred visited Ceorl at his house, was treated with apparent kindness, and then treacherously assassinated in the forest of Ridesdale. Ceorl escaped the fate which he merited; but at the distance of many years his sons, while they were feasting at the house of the eldest brother near York, were surprised by Waltheof, the grandson of Aldred. The whole family was massacred with the exception of Sumerlede, who chanced to be absent, and Canute, who owed his life to the pity inspired by his amiable character.—Sim. Dun. 81, 82. The hereditary feud, which had now continued for five generations, was at last extinguished by the Norman conquest. From it the reader may judge of the disunion, mistrust, and treachery which prevailed in armies composed of the retainers of chieftains, bound, by what they considered a most sacred duty, to seek the destruction of each other. It was to this that in a great measure was owing the success of the Danes.

² Chron. Sax. 146, 148.

³ We owe this information to Ditmar, bishop of Mersburgh, who received it the same year from an acquaintance. He tells us that Canute's ships carried on an average eighty men.—Bouquet, x. 134.

nication by land: to prevent the ingress and egress by water proved an undertaking of greater difficulty. As the fortifications of the bridge impeded the navigation of the river, by dint of labour a channel was dug on the right bank: through it were dragged a considerable number of ships; and the Northmen became masters of the Thames above as well as below the city. Still the valour of the inhabitants repelled every assault; and reduced the Dane to try the influence of promises and threats. He demanded that Edmund with his brother should be delivered into his hands; that fifteen thousand pounds should be paid for the ransom of the queen, twelve thousand for that of the bishops; and that three hundred hostages should be given as pledges for the fidelity of the citizens. If these terms were accepted, he would take them under his protection: if they were refused, the city should be abandoned to pillage and the flames.¹

Sensible that it required the exertions of an army to save the capital, Edmund endeavoured to escape during the darkness of the night. A boat conveyed the royal brothers through the Danish fleet,² and the men of Wessex hastened in crowds to their standard. They surprised a party of plunderers in the forest of Gillingham; but had soon to contend with Canute himself, who, leaving a detachment to observe the city, had advanced with the rest of his forces to crush the growing power of his competitor. The battle of Scarstan is celebrated in the writings of our annalists. Edmund placed his most approved warriors in the front; the remainder were formed into a reserve. The Danes were assisted by Edric and Ælmer with the men of Wilts and Somerset. So obstinate was the valour of the combatants, that night alone put an end to the contest. It was renewed the next morning: when Edmund, espying his adversary, with a stroke of his battle-axe divided the shield of the Dane, and wounded his horse in the shoulder. A crowd of Northmen sprung forward to protect their monarch; and Edmund retired slowly before the multitude. At this moment Edric cut off the head of Osmeor, who had been slain, and holding it in his hand exclaimed, "The head of Edmund!" At the sight, some of the English turned their backs. The indignant prince hurled his spear at the traitor; and, hastening to an eminence, uncovered his face, that he might be known to his troops. The battle was thus restored, and was a second time interrupted by the darkness of the night.³

In this murderous conflict each army had suffered severely; but the morning showed that the result was in favour of the English. Canute was already on his march to London. Edmund, as soon as he had repaired his losses, followed the footsteps of the Dane, forced him to raise the siege, and fought a second battle at Brentford. The advantage seems to have been with the enemy, who again returned to the capital, but failing in the assault, pillaged the neighbouring country. The indefatigable Edmund overtook the plunderers at Oxford, where they experienced a most signal

¹ Ditmar, ibid. Chron. Sax. 148.

² Ditmar, ibid. It is singular that Ditmar's friend should call the brother of Edmund Athelstan, and say that he fell in the next engagement. Though this prince is unknown to our national historians, yet his will is published by Lye (Dic. App. No. 6), in which he repeatedly calls Ethelred his father, Elfrida his grandmother, and Edmund and Edwy his brothers. It has been supposed that the author of the will was slain by the Danes in 1010; but the Athelstan who fell on that occasion was not the king's son. He was his "athum," or daughter's husband.—Saxon Chronicle, 139.

³ Chron. Sax. 148, 149. Flor. 618. Kuytlinga Saga, p. 130.

overthrow. It is pretended that the English monarch might have annihilated the Danes, had it not been for the perfidious counsels of Edric, who was again restored to favour.¹ Canute sailed to the Isle of Sheppey. To a personal challenge from the English hero, he coolly replied: "Let the man who talks of fighting in winter, take care to be prepared in summer."²

Within a few days the Northmen had quitted the Isle of Sheppey, and landed on the opposite coast of Essex. Edmund met them at Assington. The Danes brought into the field the mysterious standard of their fathers; and Thurchil, from the apparent flight of the raven, promised them certain victory.³ Edmund had drawn up his forces in three divisions; but at the very onset, Edric, either actuated by treachery or cowardice, fled with his division. From three in the afternoon till sunset, despair supported the natives; some of them even maintained the contest by the light of the moon; but at last they fled in every direction, and attempted by their knowledge of the country to elude the pursuit of the enemy. This defeat was most fatal to the prospects of Edmund. Almost the whole of the West-Saxon nobility perished. The Danes buried their own dead; they stripped the bodies of the English, and left them naked on the field.⁴

Canute followed his competitor into Gloucestershire, and another battle would have ensued, had not the chieftains in each army been tired of this sanguinary warfare. Compelled by the exhortations of their troops, the two kings met in the Isle of Olney, exchanged oaths and presents, and agreed to a compromise. Mercia and Northumbria were the portion of Canute: the remainder, with the royal supremacy, was retained by Edmund: but the tax called Dane-geld was extended to both kingdoms, and assigned to defray the expenses of the Danish fleet. Edmund died within a month after the pacification, and was buried near the remains of his grandfather at Glastonbury. He left two infant sons, Edward and Edmund.⁵

The reign of this king, if reign it can be called, which was a mere struggle for existence, lasted but seven months. Yet within that short space, besides having vigorously assisted in the defence of London, he fought five battles; and, till the fatal field of Assington, seemed destined to re-establish the independence of his country. From his armour or his strength he acquired the surname of "Ironside;" and his memory was long cherished by the gratitude and admiration of his subjects. Their vanity has thrown the embellishments of fiction over the character of the hero. To account for the final success of Canute, it was said that the two kings fought in single combat in the Isle of Olney: that the Dane, finding himself inferior, assailed his rival with flattery; and that by his eloquence, not his prowess, he induced

¹ Chron. Sax. 149. Flor. 618.

² Qui ares duellum in hieme, cave ne deficias aptiore tempore.—Encom. Emm. 16.

³ Encom. Emm. 16. Camden has fixed on Ashdown. Gibson prefers Assington for the scene of this battle. I follow the latter. Not only does the name bear a greater resemblance to 'Assandun,' but the barrows near Ashdown, which have been opened lately, show by their contents that they are not, as was supposed, of Saxon or Danish, but of Roman construction.—See two very interesting letters by J. Gage, Esq., in Archæol. vols. xxv. xxvi.

⁴ Ibid. 17, 18. Chron. Sax. 150. Malm. 40. Flor. 618. In this battle fell the ealdormen Ælfric, Godwin, Ulfketel, and Ethelward. Eadnoth, bishop of Dorchester, with Wulsige, the abbot of Ramsey, was slain as he was saying mass for the success of the army.—Hist. Elien. 502. Juxta morem Anglorum veterem non armis sed orationum supplicis pugnantes exercitum juvaturi.—Hist. Ram. 434.

⁵ Chron. Sax. 150. Encom. Emmæ, 18, 19, 20. Walling. 549. Florence (618) and Westminster (205) give to Edmund, London, Essex, and East Anglia.

the English prince to acquiesce in the partition of the kingdom.¹ Nor was Edmund permitted to die in the ordinary course of nature. By some writers his death was attributed to Canute, on whom it conferred the crown of Wessex: by others to Edric, as if the murder of a king were wanting to fill up the measure of his treasons. The assassins were said to have been the two chamberlains of Edmund, or Edric, or the son of Edric. Some professed themselves ignorant of the circumstances; some asserted that he was stabbed in the back in a secret and unguarded moment.² But the real fact is uncertain. The Saxon Chronicle is content with saying, that he departed on the feast of St. Andrew; the encomiast of Emma, that he died by the visitation of God.³

CHAPTER VI.

D A N E S.—A.D. 1016.

DANISH SOVEREIGNS—CANUTE—HAROLD—HARDICANUTE—SAXON LINE RESTORED—
EDWARD THE CONFESSOR—HAROLD—VICTORY OF WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR.

CANUTE.

AFTER the death of Edmund, Canute was elected king by the unanimous voice of the nation. To justify their choice it was pretended by some, that, according to the pacification of Olney, the crown belonged to him as the survivor; by others, that Edmund had appointed him the guardian and protector of his children.⁴ The best reason was the power of the Dane. No man had the wish or the hardihood to renew the bloody and unavailing contest.

The first object of Canute's policy was to secure himself on the throne. From the infancy of Edmund's children he had little to apprehend; but, as they advanced in years, they might prove dangerous competitors. Though a sea-king was seldom diverted from his purpose by considerations of humanity, Canute did not imbrue his hands in their blood, but sent them to his half-brother Olave, king of Sweden. If we may believe those, who could hardly possess the means of knowing it, the messenger who conducted the children was instructed to request in secret of Olave, that he would order them to be murdered. But whatever credit may be given to that report, it is certain that they were conveyed from Sweden to the court of Stephen, king of Hungary.⁵ That prince, who was afterwards sainted for his virtues, received the

¹ Riev. 364. West. 205. Hunt. 208.

² Ingulf, 57. Hunt. 208. West. 205. Hist. Ram. 434. Malm. 40. Saxo, 183. Hist. Eilen. 502.

³ Chron. Sax. 150. Deus Edmundum eduxit e corpore.—Encom. Emm. 20. Hominem exiit.—Walling. 549. Ambiguum quo casu extinctus.—Malm. 40.

⁴ He was chosen sponte (Encom. Emm.

p. 20), omnium consensu (Ing. 58), ex prædicta concordie conditione (Walling. 549), quia Edmundus voluerat Canutum adiutorem et protectorem esse filiorum ejus, donec regnandi ætatem habuissent (Flor. 618).

⁵ Mailros, 155. Flor. 619. Higden, 275. Our chroniclers say that they were sent to Solomon, king of Hungary. But Pape-orphans with tenderness, and educated them as his own children. Edmund died in his youth; Edward married Agatha, daughter to the emperor of Germany, and will hereafter claim the reader's attention.

Besides the children, Canute had to guard against the brothers of Edmund. Edwy was in England, and, for reasons with which we are unacquainted, was named the "king of the peasants." He was banished, recalled, and assassinated in the bosom of his family. We are told that the king had endeavoured to induce Ethelwold, a powerful thane, to undertake the murder; and that, failing in the attempt, he bribed some of Edwy's own servants.¹

Edward and Alfred, the half-brothers of Edmund, were in Normandy, and Wallingford assures us that their uncle Richard had fitted out a fleet in support of their claims.² But Canute had the wisdom to disarm his enmity, by asking in marriage his sister, the relict of Ethelred. To accept the hand of the man whose hostility had almost deprived her late husband of his kingdom, who was suspected of the murder of her sons-in-law, and who had despoiled her own children of the crown, does not indicate much delicacy in Emma; but her youth and vanity were flattered with the prospect of royalty; her brother reluctantly assented to the proposal; and the marriage was solemnly celebrated in the month of July, 1017. It had been previously agreed, that her issue by Canute should succeed to the crown of England; a condition, which, while it satisfied the Norman, extinguished the hopes of his Anglo-Saxon nephews.³

Canute had divided the kingdom into four governments. Wessex he retained for himself; East Anglia he gave to Thurchil; and continued Eric and Edric in Northumberland, and Mercia.⁴ But Edric soon received the reward of his former perfidy. The king was celebrating the festival of Christmas in London, and Edric had the imprudence to boast of his services. Canute, turning to Edric, exclaimed: "Then let him receive his deserts, that he may not betray us, as he betrayed Ethelred and Edmund." The Norwegian cut him down with his battle-axe; and the body was thrown from a window into the Thames. It has been said that Canute, though willing to derive advantage from the treason, was anxious to punish the traitor; but, as he ordered Norman and the principal retainers of Edric to be put to death at the same time, there is reason to believe that they were suspected of some plot against the Danish interest. Their punishment is a matter of triumph to the ancient annalists, who attribute to the perfidy of Edric the subjugation of their country; but the same writers lament the fate of Ethelwold and Brihtric, who perished with them, and were numbered among the most noble and blameless of the English nobility.⁵ The lands of the slain were distributed among the Danish chieftains; but several of these, aware of the hatred of the broche shows it must have been to Stephen, not to Solomon, who was not born till after the year 1061.—Act. SS. Jan. ii. 325.

¹ Chron. Sax. 151. Flor. 619. Mailros, 155. The Saxon Chronicle mentions two Edwys banished at the same time; but they appear to be one person, from Simeon (175); Higden (274); Brompton (907); Knyghton (2317). ² Walling. 550.

³ Chron. Sax. 151. Encom. Emm. 21. Malm. 40, 41.

⁴ Thurchil was expelled in 1021.—Chron. Sax. 152. See a long account of this celebrated Dane in Langebeck, ii. 468. Eric met with the same fate as Thurchil.—West. 207. Malm. 41.

⁵ Encom. Emmæ, 20. Malm. 41. Edric is said to have been killed digno fine (Ing. 58) swythe rihtlice (Chron. Sax. 152), but the others sine culpa.—Mail. 255. Flor. 619.

natives, and apprehensive for their lives, with the king's permission sold their estates, and returned with the money to their native country.¹

These emigrations to Denmark were much encouraged by Canute, who, now that he thought himself secure on the throne, made it his endeavour to win the affections of his English subjects. The presence of the Danish army was to them a constant source of uneasiness and animosity; but gratitude as well as policy forbade him to dismiss it without a liberal donative. For this purpose the sum of fifteen thousand pounds was raised on the citizens of London, of seventy-two thousand on the remainder of the nation; an oppressive burthen, but which was borne with the greater cheerfulness, when its real object was understood. Of all the associates of his labours and conquests he retained only the crews of forty ships, about three thousand men, probably the Thingmanna or royal guard, which, we are told, amounted to that number.² These were a body of soldiers selected by Canute from the whole of his forces. He was their commander; the chiefs swore fealty to him; and the privates to their chiefs. The laws are still extant, which he compiled for their use; and his chief object appears to have been to prevent the quarrels, and consequently the bloodshed, which so frequently happened among these turbulent warriors. Unfortunately the king himself was the first to transgress his own laws, by the murder of a soldier in a paroxysm of passion. He assembled the Thingmanna, descended from his throne, acknowledged his crime, and demanded punishment. They were silent. He promised impunity to every individual who should speak his sentiments. They left the decision to his own wisdom. He then adjudged himself to pay three hundred and sixty talents of gold, nine times the amount of the usual pecuniary mulct; and added nine other talents by way of farther compensation.³

Though Canute had been baptized in his infancy, he knew little of the doctrines of Christianity. But after he was seated on the English throne, the ferocity of his disposition was softened by the precepts of religion, and the sanguinary sea-king was insensibly moulded into a just and beneficent monarch. He often lamented the bloodshed and misery which his own rapacity and that of his father had inflicted on the natives; and acknowledged it his duty to compensate their sufferings by a peaceful and equitable reign.⁴ He always treated them with marked attention; protected them from the insolence of his Danish favourites; placed the two nations on a footing of equality; and admitted them alike to offices of trust and emolument. He erected a magnificent church at Assington, the scene of his last victory; and repaired the ruins of the religious edifices, which had suffered during the invasion. By his donations the abbey of

¹ Hist. Ram. 438, 443, 445.

² Chron. Sax. 151. Flor. 649. Sim. Dunel. 177. These all differ in the sum paid by the citizens of London, making it 10,500, 11,000, or 15,000 pounds. We are told in the laws of Edward the Confessor, that to provide for the safety of the Danes who remained, it was agreed that they should all enjoy the king's peace; that if a Dane were murdered, the reputed murderer, unless he could clear himself by the ordeal, should be given up to justice: that if he could not be immediately found, the inhabitants of the vill or hundred where the murder was perpetrated, should have a month and a day to search for him: that if they did not discover him, they should then pay a fine of 46 marks; that if they surrendered him to the king within a year and a day, the money should be returned; but if they did not, forty marks of the fine should be kept by the king, and the other six be given to the parents or the lord of the slain.—Leg. Sax. 199, 200.

³ Langebeck, 111, 144, et seq. Saxo, 199. The Thingmanna were also called Thingliths, and Huscables, that is,thane-men, sea-thanes, and domestics.

⁴ See his charter in Ingulf, 58.

St. Edmund's, the memorial of the cruelty of his fathers, was rendered for centuries the most opulent of the monastic establishments in the kingdom. In a witenagemot at Oxford he confirmed the laws of Edgar, and persuaded the English and Danish thanes to forgive each other every former cause of offence, and to promise mutual friendship for the future.¹ In another at Winchester a code of laws was compiled from the enactments of former kings, with such additions as were required by the existing state of society. From it some interesting particulars may be selected. I. The king exhorted all those who were intrusted with the administration of justice, to be vigilant in the punishment of crimes, but sparing of human life; to treat the penitent with less, the impenitent culprit with greater severity; and to consider the weak and indigent as worthy of pity, the wealthy and powerful as deserving the full rigour of the law; because the former were often driven to the commission of guilt by two causes, which seldom affected the latter, oppression and want. II. He severely reprobated and prohibited the custom of sending Christians for sale into foreign countries. But the reason which he assigned, was not that there is any thing immoral in the institution of slavery; but that such Christians were in danger of falling into the hands of infidel masters, and of being seduced from their religion. III. By the incorporation of the Danes with the natives, the rites of paganism had again made their appearance in the island. Canute forbade the worship of the heathen gods, of the sun or moon, of fire or water, of stones or fountains, and of forests or trees. At the same time he denounced punishment against those who pretended to deal in witchcraft, and the "workers of death," whether it were by lots, or by flame, or by any other charms. IV. The existing system of jurisprudence, which he confirmed, was divided into three branches, the law of the West Saxons, the law of the Mercians, and the law of the Danes. The two former had been preserved from the time of the Heptarchy, and prevailed in their respective districts; the latter had been introduced into East Anglia and Northumbria by the Danes, who had settled in those countries since the beginning of the ninth century. Of all three the substance was the same; they differed only in the amount of the pecuniary mulcts which were imposed on various transgressions. V. The king undertook to ease his people of part of the burthens arising from the feudal services, which in England, as well as the other European nations, had long been on the increase. He totally abolished the custom of purveyance, forbidding his officers to extort provisions for his use, and commanding his bailiffs to supply his table from the produce of his own farms. He fixed at a moderate value the heriots which were paid at the demise of tenants, and apportioned them to the rank of the deceased, whether they died intestate or not. With respect to heiresses, whose helpless condition frequently exposed them to the tyranny of their lords, he enacted, that neither maid nor widow should be compelled to marry against her will. In conclusion, he commanded these laws to be observed both by the Danes and the English, under the penalty of a single were for the first offence, of a double were for the second, and of the forfeiture of all property for the third.²

¹ Ing. ibid. Hist. Rames. 437. Encom. Emm. 23. Chron. Sax. 151. Mail. 155.

² Leg. 133—135; 143—146. Brompton, 914—931.

Though Canute generally resided in England, he frequently visited Denmark. He was accompanied by an English fleet; and carried with him pious and learned missionaries to civilize and instruct his countrymen. Of these, Bernard, Gerbrand, and Rainer were promoted to the episcopal dignity, and placed by him in Sconen, Zealand, and Fionia. In one of his visits, in 1025, he was suddenly attacked by Olave and Ulfr with a numerous army of Swedes, and was defeated with the loss of many English and Danish thanes. But our annalists add, that Godwin, who commanded the English troops, surprised the camp of the enemy during the night, and totally dispersed the Swedes. This service procured him the esteem and favour of his sovereign.¹

In 1026, Canute made a pilgrimage to Rome. On his road he visited the most celebrated churches, leaving everywhere proofs of his devotion and liberality.² In his return he proceeded immediately to Denmark, but despatched the abbot of Tavistock to England with a letter, describing the object and the issue of his journey. This letter I shall transcribe, not only because it furnishes an interesting specimen of the manners and opinions of the age, but also because it exhibits the surprising change which religion had produced in the mind of a ferocious and sanguinary warrior.

"Canute, king of all Denmark, England, and Norway, and of part of Sweden, to Egelnoth the metropolitan, to Archbishop Alfric, to all the bishops and chiefs, and to all the nation of the English, both nobles and commoners, greeting. I write to inform you that I have lately been at Rome, to pray for the remission of my sins, and for the safety of my kingdoms, and of the nations that are subject to my sceptre. It is long since I bound myself by vow to make this pilgrimage; but I had been hitherto prevented by affairs of state, and other impediments. Now, however, I return humble thanks to the Almighty God, that he has allowed me to visit the tombs of the blessed apostles Peter and Paul, and every holy place within and without the city of Rome, and to honour and venerate them in person. And this I have done, because I had learned from my teachers, that the apostle St. Peter received from the Lord the great power of binding and loosing, with the keys of the kingdom of heaven. On this account I thought it highly useful to solicit his patronage with God.

"Be it moreover known to you, that there was at the festival of Easter a great assemblage of noble personages with the lord the Pope John, and the Emperor Conrad, namely, all the chiefs of the nations from Mount Gargano to the nearest sea, who all received me honourably, and made me valuable presents; but particularly the emperor, who gave me many gold and silver vases, with rich mantles and garments. I therefore took the opportunity to treat with the pope, the emperor, and the princes, on the grievances of my people, both English and Danes; that they might enjoy more equal law, and more secure safeguard in their way to Rome, nor be detained at so many barriers, nor harassed by unjust exactions. My demands were granted both by the emperor, and by King Rodulf, to whom the greater part of the barriers belong; and it was enacted by all the princes, that my men, whether pilgrims or merchants,

¹ Adam Brem. ii. 38. Chron. Sax. 153. West. 207.

² So profuse was he in his donations, that, according to a foreign chronicler, all who lived on the road by which he passed, had reason to exclaim: Benedictio Domini super regem Anglorum Cnutonem.—Chron. Wil. Godel. apud Bouquet, x. 262.

should for the future go to Rome and return in full security, without detention at the barriers, or the payment of unlawful tolls.

"I next complained to the pope, and expressed my displeasure that such immense sums were extorted from my archbishops, when according to custom they visited the Apostolic See to obtain the pallium. A decree was made that this grievance should cease. Whatever I demanded, for the benefit of my people, either of the pope, or the emperor, or the princes, through whose dominions lies the road to Rome, was granted willingly, and confirmed by their oaths, in the presence of four archbishops, twenty bishops, and a multitude of dukes and nobles. Wherefore I return sincere thanks to God that I have successfully performed whatever I had intended, and have fully satisfied all my wishes.

"Now, therefore, be it known to you all, that I have dedicated my life to the service of God, to govern my kingdoms with equity, and to observe justice in all things. If by the violence or negligence of youth I have violated justice heretofore, it is my intention, by the help of God, to make full compensation. Therefore I beg and command those to whom I have confided the government, as they wish to preserve my friendship, or save their own souls, to do no injustice either to rich or poor. Let all persons, whether noble or ignoble, obtain their rights according to law, from which no deviation shall be allowed, either from fear of me, or through favour to the powerful, or for the purpose of supplying my treasury. I have no need of money raised by injustice.

"I am now on my road to Denmark, for the purpose of concluding peace with those nations, who, had it been in their power, would have deprived us both of our crown and our life. But God has destroyed their means, and will, I trust, of his goodness, preserve us and humble all our enemies. When I shall have concluded peace with the neighbouring nations, and settled the concerns of my eastern dominions, it is my intention to return to England, as soon as the fine weather will permit me to sail. But I have sent you this letter beforehand; that all the people of my kingdom may rejoice at my prosperity. For you all know that I never spared nor will spare myself, or my labour, when my object is the advantage of my subjects.

"Lastly, I entreat all my bishops, and all the sheriffs, by the fidelity which they owe to me and to God, that the church-dues according to the ancient laws may be paid before my return; namely, the plough alms, the tithes of cattle of the present year, the Peter-pence, the tithes of fruit in the middle of August, and the kirk-shot at the feast of St. Martin, to the parish church. Should this be omitted at my return, I will punish the offender by exacting the whole fine appointed by law. Fare ye well."¹

The power of Canute released the kingdom from the horrors of domestic war; but his ambition thirsted for a crown which had formerly been worn by his father. Sweyn had divided Norway between two brothers, Eric and Haco. When Eric accepted Northumberland from Canute, Haco succeeded to the whole, but was driven from it by the superior power of Olave, a Norwegian sea-king. Canute seduced the natives from their allegiance to Olave by presents, sailed to Norway with an English fleet of fifty vessels; and was everywhere received with acclamations of joy, and professions of attachment. He expelled Olave and restored Haco. But the latter was soon afterwards drowned at sea; and Olave recovered his dominions. That prince was a zealous Christian; but his religious innovations irritated the jealousy of the pagan priests; and he was murdered in an insurrection of his subjects.¹

¹ Spelm. Conc. 537. Ing. 59. Flor. 620. Malm. 41.

Canute's last military effort was directed against Scotland. Fordun tells us, that Duncan, who, as nephew and heir to Malcolm, was in possession of Cumberland, refused to hold it of Canute, because that prince had not obtained the crown by hereditary descent; but that, before the armies could engage, the two kings were reconciled, and the ancient conditions respecting the possession of Cumberland were solemnly renewed. Of these particulars our annalists are ignorant; and merely inform us, that Malcolm, unable to oppose the superior power of the English monarch, submitted to his pleasure with two inferior princes, Melbeth and Jermac.²

The courtiers of Canute, to please his vanity, were accustomed to extol him as the greatest of kings, whose will was obeyed by six powerful nations, the English, Scots, and Welsh, the Danes, Swedes, and Norwegians. Canute either had the good sense to despise, or affected to despise, their flattery. On one of these occasions, as he was sitting on the shore near Southampton, he commanded the sea to respect its sovereign. But the influx of the tide soon compelled him to retire, and he improved the opportunity to read his flatterers a lecture on the weakness of earthly kings, when compared with the power of that supreme Being who rules the elements. Impressed with this idea, he is said, on his return to Winchester, to have taken the crown from his head, and to have placed it on the great crucifix in the cathedral, and never more to have worn it even at public ceremonies.³

Canute lived several years after his pilgrimage to Rome. He died at Shaftesbury in 1035, and was buried at Winchester. By his queen Emma he had two children, a son, whom from his own name he called Hardecnute, or Canute the Hardy, and a daughter, Gunihilda, who was married to Henry, the son of Conrad, and emperor of Germany. Besides these children, Alfgive, the daughter of Alfhelm, earl of Northampton, had borne him, previously to his marriage, two sons, Sweyn and Harold. Their illegitimacy, in the opinion of the age, was no great disgrace; and the violence of party endeavoured to obstruct their advancement, by describing them as supposititious. But that they were acknowledged by their father, is evident. To the elder, Sweyn, was given the crown of Norway, after the assassination of Olave; Harold, by his promptitude and the favour of the soldiery, ascended the throne of England on the demise of Canute.⁴

HAROLD, SURNAMED HAREFOOT.

By the marriage settlement between Canute and Emma, and by a more recent declaration of the king, the crown ought to have devolved on Hardecnute. But that prince had been previously sent to take possession of Denmark, and his absence encouraged the ambition of his illegitimate brother, Harold, whose interests were warmly espoused by the Thingmanna at London,⁵ the Danes in general, and the northern English. The wishes of the southern counties

¹ Chron. Sax. 153. Flor. 620. Snorre, 278.

² Fordun, iv. 41. Chron. Sax. 153. Hunt. 206. West. 209.

³ Hunt. 209. West. 209.

⁴ Chron. Sax. 155. Ing. 61. Flor. 622.

West. 206. The last writer describes Alfgive as married to Canute.

⁵ The Saxon Chronicle calls them the lithemen at London, and as the Thingmanna were also called Thing*liths*, I have no doubt they were the same persons.

were divided between Hardecanute and one of the two sons of Ethelred, who still resided in Normandy. The country appeared on the eve of a civil war; and many, to escape the impending tempest, had sought an asylum in the morasses and forests; when a compromise was effected in a witena-gemot at Oxford. To Harold were allotted London and the northern division of the kingdom; the counties on the right bank of the Thames were appropriated to Hardecanute, and during his absence were committed to the government of his mother Emma, and the ealdorman Godwin.¹

As soon as the news of the death of Canute had reached Normandy, Edward, the eldest of the surviving sons of Ethelred, and afterwards king of England, collected a fleet of forty ships, crossed the Channel, and landed at Southampton. If he relied on the co-operation of his mother, he was deceived. Emma was more attached to her children by Canute than to those by Ethelred; and was actually making every exertion to preserve the crown for Hardecanute. Though Edward landed within a few miles of her residence, and in the midst of her retainers, he found himself in a hostile country; a formidable force, which was hourly increasing, menaced him with destruction; and the prince and his followers having plundered a few villages, retired to their ships, and returned to Normandy. The result of this expedition seems not to have been forgotten; and Emma, at a later period, was punished for her disaffection by the neglect of her son, and the forfeiture of her treasures.²

We are not told what were the reasons which determined Hardecanute to trifle away his time in Denmark. Harold profited by the delay; and by threats and promises, and presents, continued to extend his authority. But what chiefly contributed to fix him on the throne was a bloody and mysterious occurrence, of which at the present day it is difficult to discover either the origin or the motive. A letter was conveyed to Edward and his brother Alfred in Normandy. It purported to be written by their mother, upbraiding them with their apathy, describing the growing ascendancy of Harold, and urging one of them to cross the sea, and to assert his right to the crown. By the historian who has preserved this letter, it is pronounced a forgery, contrived by Harold to decoy one of the two princes into his hands.³ But it will require no small share of credulity to believe this story. Why should he invite only one, and not both of the brothers? By removing both out of his way, he would secure himself against the claimants, to whom the eyes of the natives were principally directed: but the benefit which might be derived from the murder of one would be more than balanced by the infamy which would result from so detestable a crime. However this may be, it is certain that Alfred, the younger, accepted the invitation, raised a small body of troops in Normandy, repaired to the court of Baldwin, earl of Flanders, and by the addition of a few adventurers from Boulogne, swelled the number of his followers to six hundred men. At Sandwich he found a strong force prepared to oppose him; and changing his course, steered round the North Foreland, till he came opposite to the city of Canterbury, where he landed without discovering an enemy. Within a few hours he was met by Godwin, who pledged to him his faith, and undertook to conduct him to Emma. Leaving London on the right, because it belonged to Harold, they proceeded to Guildford, where the earl quartered Alfred and his men in small bodies among the inhabitants, supplied them plentifully with provisions, and having promised to wait on the prince in the morning, retired to his own residence. In the midst of the night, the satellites of Harold arrived, surprised the strangers in their beds, and reserved them for the butchery of the following day. With their hands bound behind them they were ranged in a line; every tenth man out of the six hundred received his liberty; and of the rest a few were selected for slavery. The scene which followed can hardly be paralleled in the annals of American ferocity. The remaining victims were maimed, or blinded, or hamstrung, or scalped, or embowelled, according to the caprice or barbarity of their tormentors. "Never," says one of the chroniclers, "was a more bloody deed done in this land since the arrival of the Danes." The prince himself was hurried away to Harold in London, and thence to the Isle of Ely, under the charge of a thane, whose threats and insults aggravated the horrors of his situation. Seated on a sorry horse, stripped of his clothes, and with his feet tied beneath the saddle, the son of Ethelred was exposed in each town and village to the derision, perhaps to the commiseration, of the beholders. At Ely he was arraigned before a court of miscreants, and adjudged to lose his eyes. The sentence was executed by main force; and the unfortunate prince, after lingering a few days, expired, either through the violence of his sufferings, or by the dagger of an assassin.¹

¹ Chron. Sax. 154, 155. Ingul. 61. Encom. Emm. 25, 26.

² Gul. Pict. 37, 38, ed. Mas. W. Gem. 271. Leg. Sax. 210. ³ Encom. Emm. 28.

Of the truth of this melancholy tale there is no reason to doubt. It has been transmitted to us by a contemporary writer, who received his information from the survivors of the massacre; and his narrative is fully confirmed by the testimony of succeeding historians. Yet it is difficult to believe, that such unnecessary cruelty, so wanton a waste of human blood, could have been, as is pretended, a mere act of precaution on the part of Harold. It wears more the appearance of a deed, stimulated by the thirst of revenge, or prompted by the hope of inspiring terror. Perhaps Alfred, by his previous cruelty, had sharpened the resentment of his enemies; undoubtedly he had come for the purpose of driving Harold from the throne,² and probably at the invitation of Emma; for that princess immediately prepared to quit the country, and accepted the offer of an asylum at Bruges from Baldwin of Flanders, who had patronized the attempt of the unfortunate Alfred.³

Her flight left Harold without an opponent: the thanes of Wessex withdrew their allegiance from his half-brother; and he was unanimously chosen king of England. But when he called on Egelnath, the archbishop of Canterbury, to perform the ceremony of his coronation, that prelate, placing the insignia of royalty on the altar, boldly replied: "There are the crown and sceptre, which Canute intrusted to my charge. To you I neither give nor refuse them. You

¹ Gul. Pict. 39. Encom. Emm. 29—31. This historian wrote within three years after the massacre. His testimony will overbalance the doubts of Malmesbury (43). Malmesbury (ibid.) supposes the murder of Alfred to have taken place after the death of Harold: Huntingdon after that of Hardecnute. But the monk of St. Omer affixes it to the reign of Harold, and the Chronicles of Mailros (156), of Florence (623), of Westminster (210), to the year 1036. Higden thus describes the punishment of embowelling. Primordia viscerum fecit ad palos erectos figi, et tunc corpora circumduci, donec novissima intestinorum extraherentur.—Hig. 227.

² Sceptrum et ipse paternum requirebat.—Gul. Pict. 38. Ut paternum regnum obtineret.—West. 210.

³ Encom. Emm. 32.

may take them if you please; but I strictly forbid any of my brother bishops to usurp an office, which is the prerogative of my see." Of Harold's behaviour on this extraordinary occurrence, we are ignorant; but he appears to have subsequently removed the primate's objections, and to have been crowned with the usual solemnities.¹

No details of his government have been transmitted to posterity. One writer insinuates, that he was a benefactor to the Church: another, hostile to his memory, asserts that, through hatred of Christianity, he absented himself from all the public offices of religion.² His principal amusement was the chase, in which he frequently hunted on foot, and from his fleetness acquired the surname of "harefoot." After a short reign of four years, he died in 1040, and was buried at Westminster.

HARDECANUTE.

Emma, after her arrival at Bruges, had endeavoured, by frequent messages, to inflame the ambition, and accelerate the preparations of her son Hardecanut. Two years, however, elapsed, before she was able to direct his attention to his interests in England; and then, leaving a powerful armament in port, he sailed with nine ships to consult his mother. During his residence with her at Bruges, a messenger arrived with the welcome intelligence of the death of Harold; and he was followed by a deputation of English and Danish theanes, requesting Hardecanut to ascend the throne of his father. As soon as his fleet had joined him from Denmark, he proceeded with sixty-two sail to England.³ His authority was immediately acknowledged; but one of the first measures of his government excited universal discontent. By Canute the Thingmanna had been reduced to the complement of sixteen ships; and the pay of these Danish guards had been long defrayed by the nation at the annual rate of eight marks for each private, and of twelve marks for each officer. The addition of the new fleet had multiplied their number in a five-fold degree; and the tax which was imposed in consequence, experienced considerable opposition. At Worcester the collectors, Thurstan and Feader, were put to death in an insurrection of the populace. But a severe punishment followed the offence. During four days the county was given up to pillage, and on the fifth the city was reduced to ashes. The inhabitants had fled to an island in the Severn, where they defended themselves till they appeased the vengeance, and obtained the pardon, of the king.⁴

Hardecanut could not forget the injuries of Harold to himself and to his relatives, the usurpation of the crown, the exile of Emma, and the murder of Alfred; and his feelings urged him to an act of impotent revenge, the folly of which was equal to its barbarity. As if he could make the dead to feel, he ordered the tomb of his predecessor to be opened, the body to be decapitated, and the head and trunk to be thrown into the Thames. Both were recovered by some fishermen, who deposited them in the cemetery of St. Clement's, the usual burying-place of the Danes.⁵

The care of this posthumous execution had been delegated to Alfric, archbishop of York, and Godwin, earl of Wessex. But the commissioners disagreed, and the prelate accused the earl of the murder of Alfred.

¹ Encom. Emm. 28, 29. He gave to the monastery of Croyland the mantle which he wore at his coronation.—Ingul. 61.

² Ing. ibid. Encom. Emm. 29.

³ Encom. Emm. 34.

⁴ Chron. Sax. 155, 156. Flor. 623, 635. Malm. 43.

⁵ Flor. 623. West. 211. Mailros, 156.

Godwin denied the charge, and cleared himself, in the legal manner, by his own oath, and the oaths of a jury of his peers, the principal noblemen in England.¹ It cannot be ascertained whether this acquittal removed the suspicions of Hardecnute: but the earl was restored to favour, and participated with Emma in the administration of the kingdom. He had made to the king a most magnificent present, a ship of the usual dimensions, of which the stern was covered with plates of gold. It carried eighty warriors, the retainers of Godwin. Their lances, helmets, and coats of mail were gilt; their battle-axes glistened with decorations of gold and silver; the hilts of their swords, the nails and bosses of their shields, were of gold; and they wore round each arm two golden bracelets of the weight of sixteen ounces.² This account will not excite surprise in the reader, who recollects that the Northmen were accustomed to expend the plunder of nations in embellishing their arms and ships, objects of inestimable value in the eyes of the northern pirates.³

Hardecnute is described as mild in his manners, and generous in his disposition. His table was copiously supplied at four different hours in the day. This was no mean recommendation in the opinion of the chieftains, who set a high value on the pleasures of the table, and expected to eat and drink at the expense of the sovereign.⁴ He sent for his half-brother Edward from Normandy, received him with the sincerest friendship, and gave him a princely establishment. His sister Gunihlda, the fairest woman of her time, he married to the emperor Henry. All the thanes, both English and Danish, attended her to the sea-shore, desirous of attracting the notice of the king, by the attention which they paid to the princess; and never before, say the chronicles, was seen in England, so magnificent a display of gold, and silver, and gems, and of silken vests, and beautiful horses. The songs which were composed on the occasion, continued to be sung by the people in their convivial meetings, and preserved the memory of Gunihlda through many succeeding generations.⁵

The character of the king was such as to afford the presage of a tranquil and prosperous reign. But his constitution was feeble, and his life had been frequently endangered by disease. In his second year he honoured with his presence the nuptials of a

¹ The guilt of Godwin will always remain a problem. It may be urged against him that Alfred at the time of the murder was under his protection, and in his town of Guildford; that within four years he was publicly accused of it by the archbishop of York; and that he is condemned without hesitation by almost every historian who wrote after the Conquest. On the other hand it may be observed, 1st, That the monk of St. Omer, who was so well acquainted with the transaction, far from charging the earl, seems to represent him as perfectly ignorant of Alfred's danger: Ad sua recessit hospitium, mane rediturus, ut domino suo serviret cum debitis honorificentia.—Enc. Emm. 30. 2nd, That the accusation of the archbishop is balanced by the acquittal of Godwin on his trial: 3rd, That little reliance is to be placed on the assertion of writers posterior to the Conquest, when every tale which could vilify the family of Godwin was gratefully accepted, and eagerly countenanced by the reigning dynasty. Edward the Confessor, in two of his charters, attributes the death of his brother to Harold, and (which is more singular) to Hardecnute. Now the latter prince was in Denmark, and the accusation, if it meant any thing, must allude to those who governed in the name of Hardecnute, and in that hypothesis may reach Emma, or Godwin, or both. The king's words are, "Haroldo et Hardecnuto, a quibus et alter meus frater Alfredus crudeliter est occisus."—Spel. Con. 628, 632. Yet, would Harold, who was then all-powerful, have subscribed to these charters, if they had cast so foul a stain on the memory of his father?

² Malm. 43. Mailros, 156. Flor. 623. West. 211.

³ See Encom. Emm. 8, 13. Snorre, 338.

⁴ Hunt. 209.

⁵ Malm. 43.

noble Dane at Lambeth. As he was standing in the midst of the company, and lifting the cup to his mouth, he suddenly fell to the ground, was carried speechless to his chamber, and in a short time expired. His body was laid near that of his father in the church of Winchester.¹

Hardecanut left no issue. His death severed the connection between the crowns of England and Denmark. Magnus, the son of Olave, who had driven Sweyn from Norway, now obtained possession of Denmark.

EDWARD THE CONFESSOR.

Before the body of the departed king could be laid in the grave, his half-brother Edward had been called to the throne by the voice of the citizens of London. The rightful heir of the Saxon line was the son of Edmund Ironside, the exile in Hungary. But, in determining the succession, the English had frequently substituted the uncle for the nephew. Edward was present; his character and his misfortunes pleaded in his favour; the wishes of the natives loudly demanded a king of the race of Cerdic: and the murmurs of the Danes, if the Danes were inclined to murmur, were speedily silenced by the overwhelming influence of Godwin. It was not, however, before the following Easter, that the son of Ethelred, having promised to preserve the laws of

Canute, was crowned by Archbishop Eadsy, who embraced the opportunity of reading to the new sovereign a long lecture on the regal duties, and the paternal government of his Saxon predecessors.²

Edward was now about forty years of age, twenty-seven of which he had spent an exile in Normandy. Precluded by circumstances from every rational hope of obtaining the crown, he had solaced the hours of banishment with the pleasures of the chase, and the exercises of religion; and he brought with him to the throne those habits of moderation and tranquillity which he had acquired in a private station. He was a good, rather than a great, king. To preserve peace, and promote religion, to enforce the ancient laws, and to diminish the burthens of his people, were the chief objects of his government: but he possessed not that energy of mind, nor that ferocity of disposition, which, perhaps, were necessary to command the respect, and to repress the violence, of the lawless nobles by whom he was surrounded.

At his accession he found three powerful chieftains near the throne, Godwin, Leofric, and Siward. They bore the title of earls: for the ascendancy of the Danes had introduced Danish customs and Danish appellations. The ealdormen of the Saxons had been transformed into the earl of

¹ Ibid. Flor. 624.

² Knyghton, 2338. Chron. Sax. 157. Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1043, published at the end of Lye's Dictionary. I shall refer to it by that name, because it was copied by Lambarde. By the Norman writers, Edward's accession is attributed to the exertions of William, duke of Normandy, then in his fifteenth year. We are told that he demanded the crown for Edward by his messengers, that he sent Edward from Normandy with a guard, and that he threatened to follow with a powerful army. The fear of an invasion made the choice of the English fall on Edward.—Guil. Pict. p. 44, edit. Maseres. I consider this as one of the fictions invented in Normandy to account for the appointment, real or pretended, of William by Edward to be his successor. That the English prince was at the very period in England, and not in Normandy, is evident, not only from our English chroniclers, but from the monk of St. Omer, who, in the last lines addressed by him to Emma, praises the union in which she lives in England with her two sons Edward and Hardecanut (Encom. Emm. p. 36), and from William of Jumieges, who says that Hardecanut called Edward from Normandy, and that they lived afterwards together (Guil. Gem. vii.). It is remarkable that the first of these writers says Edward was sent for, that he might partake of the kingdom (ut veniens secum obtineret regnum, p. 38); the second, that Hardecanut left him heir to the kingdom (totius regni reliquit heredem).—Ibid.

the Northmen; and the different earldoms were parcelled out as circumstances suggested, some being confined within narrow limits, while others were extended to several counties. As the delegates of the sovereign, the earls possessed considerable power. They levied forces, received fines, tried causes, and exercised the ordinary functions of royalty within their respective jurisdictions: but they were removable at the will of the king and the witan, and did not transmit their offices, as inheritances, to their children. The earldom of Siward extended from the Humber to the confines of Scotland; Leofric was called the earl of Leicester, but his government comprehended most of the northern counties of Mercia. Godwin ruled in Wessex, Sussex, and Kent; and his two sons, Sweyn and Harold, already possessed, or soon obtained, the former the earldom of Gloucester, Hereford, Somerset, Oxford, and Berks; the latter that of Essex, Middlesex, Huntingdon, East Anglia, and Cambridgeshire. When united, these noblemen were more than a match for the king, whose chief security lay in their mutual jealousies and discordant interests.

It was fortunate for Edward, that, in the commencement of his reign, these powerful chieftains overlooked every subject of private dissension in their common zeal for the royal service. By their aid the restoration of the crown to the Saxon line was peaceably effected, and the Danish families, whose fidelity was ambiguous, or whose former tyranny deserved punishment, were driven out of the kingdom. To the list of the sufferers must be added the queen-mother. Edward held a council at Gloucester: thence, accompanied by Godwin, Leofric, and Siward, he hastened to Winchester, seized her treasures, and swept away the cattle and corn from the lands which she possessed as her dower.¹ The reader will already have noticed several instances of this species of military execution; but why it was inflicted upon Emma we have no particular information. By her partiality to the Danes she had acquired the hatred of the natives. The riches, which she collected with assiduity, had always been at the command of her younger children, while her sons by Ethelred were suffered to feel the privations of poverty. To her opposition was owing, in all probability, the failure of Edward's descent after the death of Canute; and it was even whispered that she was not guiltless of the blood of Alfred.² Her antipathy to the king had discovered itself since his accession; and she had obstinately refused to grant him any pecuniary aid.³ But whatever were the motives which prompted this act of severity towards her, the character of Edward, and the sanction of his council, will justify the belief that it had not been wantonly adopted. She was still permitted to retain her dower, and to reside at Winchester, where she died in 1052.

While Edward was employed in consolidating his power at home, a formidable competitor was rising in the north. Hardecnute, when he ruled in Denmark, had been frequently engaged in war with Magnus, the conqueror of Norway; till both princes, fatigued with the useless struggle, had consented to a peace, on the precarious, but not unusual condition, that the survivor should succeed to the dominions of his deceased adversary. At the death of

¹ Chron. Sax. 157. Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1043.

² This is asserted by the monk of Winchester, who relates every fable.—Ang. Sac.

i. 292. But it appears to derive some support from the assertion of Edward, mentioned at the end of note, p. 166.

³ Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1043.

Hardecanute, Magnus occupied Denmark. But this did not satisfy his ambition; he also demanded the English crown, on the plea that, since it had been worn by Hardecanute, it was included in the provisions of the treaty. To his messengers Edward returned a sensible and resolute answer: that he sat on the English throne as the descendant of the English monarchs; that he had been called to it by the free choice of the people; and that he would never abandon it but with his life. The Northman had threatened to support his pretensions with all the power of Denmark and Norway; and Edward, to oppose the danger, had collected a numerous fleet at Sandwich. But Magnus was detained at home to defend his own territories against the rival efforts of Sweyn, the son of Ulfr and Althriþa, the sister of Canute. Sweyn was defeated, and his cause appeared desperate, when the unexpected death of Magnus raised him to the throne. Norway was immediately seized by Harold, the nephew of Olave: he engaged in hostilities with Sweyn; and both princes ineffectually solicited the aid of the king of England. Sweyn had formerly requested fifty ships to support him against Magnus: he now demanded the same number against Harold. Though his requests were supported by all the influence of Godwin, who had married his aunt Githa, the witena-gemot on both occasions returned a peremptory refusal.¹

From the failure of Godwin in these attempts, it would appear as if the other noblemen, alarmed at his increasing influence, had combined to oppose his designs, and undermine his power. For besides their former honours, his sons had acquired a distinguished place in Edward's affections,² and his daughter had been crowned queen of England. By the chroniclers favourable to the Godwins, Editha has been panegyricized for her learning, and piety, and liberality. She was in their language "the rose blooming in the midst of thorns."³ By others she has been painted in less amiable colours; and there are certain facts, which seem to depose that she was as vindictive of spirit, and as reckless of blood as any of her kindred. We are told that it was with the utmost reluctance that Edward consented to the marriage; declaring that she might enjoy the honours of a queen, but not the rights of a wife; a declaration interpreted by some to mean that he had bound himself by vow to a life of continency, but attributed by others to his rooted antipathy to Godwin and his family.⁴

The power of the Godwins received its first shock from the ungovernable passions of Sweyn, the eldest of the five brothers. He had violated the person of Edgiva, the abbess of Leominster, and the indignant piety of Edward drove him into banishment. The outlaw assumed the profession of a sea-king, and sought wealth and power by piratical depredations. Weary at last with wandering on the ocean, he returned to England, sent his submission to the king, and obtained a promise of pardon. But the execution of the promise was opposed by two unexpected adversaries, his

¹ Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1046, 1048, 1049. Malm. 60. Mailros, 157. Snorre, 38.

² They were "thæs cynges dyrlingas."—Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1052.

³ Ingulf, 62. This writer tells us that when he was a boy, Editha would often stop him as he came from school, make him repeat his lesson, ask him questions in grammar and logic, and as a reward give him a few pieces of silver, and send him to the larder.—Ibid.

⁴ Chron. Sax. 157. Malm. i. p. 334. In one of his charters Edward prays for peace for himself and his posterity—et posteris meis.—Wilkins, Con. i. 319. A prayer not very reconcilable with a vow of continency.

brother Harold, and Beorn his cousin, who had shared his earldom between them. Disappointment urged him to revenge, which he sought under the mask of friendship. At the request of the emperor Henry, Edward had collected a numerous fleet for the purpose of opposing Baldwin, earl of Flanders. This armament was divided into two squadrons, of which one lay at Sandwich, under the immediate command of the king, the other at Pevensey, under that of Earl Godwin. Sweyn, concealing his real design, visited his father at Pevensey, where he was apparently reconciled to Beorn, and prevailed on that thane to withdraw his opposition. Thence the two cousins proceeded together towards Sandwich, for the avowed purpose of soliciting the royal clemency in favour of the outlaw; but on the road Beorn was suddenly seized by a body of armed men, hurried on board a ship at Bosenham, and conveyed to Dartmouth, on the coast of Devon. The mariners of Sweyn, by the command of their master, murdered and buried their prisoner; his bones were afterwards discovered at a great depth in the ground, and re-interred near those of his uncle Canute, at Winchester. The assassins sailed to Bruges, and found an asylum under the protection of Baldwin, earl of Flanders, who had made his peace with the emperor.¹ After this aggravation of his guilt, it is strange that Sweyn should cherish the hope of forgiveness; and still more strange that he should ultimately obtain it. But time wore down the edge of Edward's resentment; and pity, or the recollection of former friendship, or the fear of alienating a powerful family, induced him, at the solicitation of the bishop of Worcester, to restore the outlaw to his honours and estates.

In the same year that active and zealous pontiff, Leo IX., consecrated the great church at Rheims, and held a council the next day, in which were promulgated certain canons against simoniacal preferments in the Church. Dudoc, bishop of Wells, Walfric, abbot of St. Augustine's, and Elfwine, abbot of Ramsey, were present, with instructions to bring back accurate information of "the decrees which should be passed for the welfare of Christendom." But Leo had summoned another and more general council to meet in Rome on the following festival of Easter; and to this Heriman, bishop of Sherborne, and Eldred, bishop of Worcester, were sent, both as representatives of the Anglo-Saxon prelacy, and as messengers from the king. As English bishops, they took part in the promulgation of canons against simony, and in the excommunication of Berengarius on account of his new doctrines respecting the Eucharist;² as the king's messengers they consulted the pope and council respecting a case which perplexed the royal conscience. Edward had vowed to visit the tombs of the apostles at Rome, like his predecessors, Ethelwulf and Canute; but the witan objected to his departure from England, as long as he had no heir to the crown. Leo, having consulted the council, absolved the king from his vow, but on the condition that the money, which he had collected to defray the expense of his

¹ Chron. Sax. 160. Flor. 626.

² It is sometimes pretended that the doctrine of the Anglo-Saxon church respecting the Eucharist was the same as that of Berengarius. But how is it possible to reconcile this with the fact, that the representatives of the Anglo-Saxon church anathematized Berengarius and his doctrine in the council? That the bishops Heriman and Aldred formed part of the council, is plain from Wilkins, Conc. i. 316, the Saxon Chronicle, 161, and the catalogue of the bishops present, in Mansi, p. 1294. That Berengarius and his doctrine were condemned is certain from Lanfranc, Bib. Pat. xi. 338.

journey, should be distributed among the poor, and that out of his yearly income he should found, or refund, an abbey in honour of St. Peter. This commutation was accepted; the money was given in doles to the poor, and from that moment the tenth part of the receipts from the king's manors was faithfully set apart for the foundation of the abbey.¹

In the beginning of the same year died Eadsy, the archbishop of Canterbury, who was succeeded by Robert of Jumieges, the king's favourite. Edward had been acquainted with him, when he was a simple monk in Normandy, had brought him to England, made him one of his chaplains, and then preferred him to the see of London. Robert, immediately on his translation to Canterbury, set out on a journey to Rome, in compliance with the ancient practice. For, ever since the origin of Christianity among the Anglo-Saxons, it had been required of every metropolitan, that in token of his subjection to the Church of Rome, he should repair soon after his election to the holy city, and should solicit from the pope the grant of the pallium, in confirmation of his archiepiscopal authority. It was customary for the pontiff on these occasions to inquire into the state of religion in England, and to give to the new metropolitan particular instructions for his conduct. From the known character of Leo, there can be no doubt that he would insist on the strict observance of the canons lately passed against simony; and Robert, immediately on his return, found occasion on which he deemed it his duty to enforce them. During his absence Sparhavoc (Sparrow-hawk), abbot of Abingdon, had been appointed his successor in the see of London. Robert refused to consecrate him. Sparhavoc repaired again to Canterbury with the royal mandate in his hand, and met with another refusal. To every petition and remonstrance the archbishop replied, that he could not disobey the orders which he had received from the pope. The controversy lasted during several months; but Sparhavoc yielded at last, and was superseded by William, a foreigner also, and one of the royal chaplains.²

The two marriages of Emma, a Norman princess, with two kings of England, had given occasion to the settlement of some Norman families in England; and the subsequent accession of Edward to the throne had added to their number. He had been accompanied or followed by several foreign churchmen, whom he raised to high ecclesiastical dignities, and by several laymen, who appear to have held inferior offices in the royal household. One of them he honoured with the title and office of earl, Radulf, the son of Drogo, count of Mantes; but then, if Radulf were a Frenchman on the father's side, he was an Anglo-Saxon by his mother Goda, the sister of Edward. On the death of Drogo this lady had married Eustace, count of Boulogne, who, in 1050, came to England, to visit his brother-in-law. It chanced, however, that either in his way to the court, or in his return from it, his followers quarrelled with the burghers of Dover, a town belonging to Earl Godwin; both had recourse to arms, and several persons, natives as well as foreigners, were slain. This sanguinary affray has been attributed by different writers to accident, or the insolence of the strangers, or the inhospitality of the natives. Eustace however hastened to the king to complain of the insult; whilst many of his followers obtained possession of, or admission into, the "Castle on the Cliff." Edward, irritated by the representations of Eustace, ordered

¹ Wilk. i. 316—320.

² Chron. Sax. p. 162.

³ Normannos et Bononienses qui castellum in Dorbernis clivo tenebant.—Hov. ad

Godwin to chastise the insolence of his men. The earl disdained to obey; his two sons applauded the spirit of their father; and improved the present opportunity to direct the national animosity against the foreign favourites. Three armies from the three earldoms of Godwin, Sweyn, and Harold, directed their march towards Longtree, in Gloucestershire, to punish, as it was pretended, the depredations committed on the lands of Harold by the French garrison of a castle in Herefordshire.¹ But Edward, who lay at Gloucester, was not to be deceived by this flimsy pretext; he summoned to his aid Radulf, and Leofric, and Siward, and was soon in a condition to intimidate his opponents. The troops demanded to be led against the insurgent earls, and the best blood in England, says the chronicler, would have been shed, had not more temperate measures been suggested by the wisdom of Leofric, and adopted by the moderation of Edward. It was proposed to summon the witenagemot, and to refer every subject of dispute to the decision of that assembly. To so equitable an offer Godwin dared not object; and hostages, as if the two parties were on a footing of equality, were mutually exchanged. At the appointed day, the autumnal equinox, Edward entered London at the head of the most powerful army that had been seen for many years; Godwin at the same time took possession of Southwark with a considerable number of followers. But the influence of the earl shrunk before the awe that was created by the majesty of the king, and the terror that was inspired by the superiority of his force. The insurgent army gradually melted away; and Sweyn, on the night before the day appointed for an inquiry into the death of Beorn, thought it prudent to flee. He was solemnly pronounced an outlaw; the thanes, who held of Godwin and Harold, were compelled to swear fealty to the king; and the two earls were ordered to clear themselves of the accusations against them by the oaths of twelve compurgators in the presence of the witan. As a previous condition they demanded hostages for their safety; but this demand was sternly refused; and they were allowed five days either to establish their innocence, or to quit the kingdom. Godwin, with his wife and three sons, Sweyn, Tostig, and Gurth, fled for protection to the earl of Flanders; Harold, and his brother Leofwin, hastened to Bristol, embarked on board a vessel belonging to Sweyn, and with difficulty reached Ireland.² The queen was involved in the common disgrace of her family. Her lands were seized by the king, and her person intrusted to the custody of Edward's sister, the abbess of Wherwell. Some writers affirm that she was treated with great severity; but a contemporary historian assures us, that she was conducted with royal pomp to the monastery allotted for her residence, and informed that her confinement was only a measure of temporary precaution.³

At the very commencement of the insurrection, the foreign favourites had trembled for their safety; and by their advice Edward had solicited the assistance of William, duke of Normandy. 'Tranquillity was hardly' re-ann. 1051. Flor. ad ann. 1051. The chronicler for Normans and Bolognese, has Fræncyr; can.

¹ The Normans who had followed Edward built castles on their lands after the manner of their own country. Thus, besides the castle at Hereford, we meet with Robert's castle, Pentecoste's castle, &c.—Chron. Sax. 163, 167. Chron. Lamb. 1052. The foreigners who formed the garrisons are called indifferently Fræncisc men, or Welisc (foreign, perhaps Gaulish) men. The latter term has caused some confusion, on account of its similarity to the word "Welshman."

² Chron. Sax. 163, 164. Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1052.

³ The author of the Life of Edward, quoted by Stow, p. 96. His authority is the greater, as he dedicated his work to Editha herself.—Ibid.

stored, when that prince, with a powerful fleet, reached the coast of England. As his services were no longer wanted, he landed with a gallant train of knights, was kindly received by the king, visited several of the royal villas, and was dismissed with magnificent presents. Many have pretended, that the real object of this interview was the future succession of William to the crown of England; but Ingulf, who accompanied that prince on his return to Normandy, and was for several years his confidential secretary, assures us, that the idea of succeeding to the English throne had not yet presented itself to his mind.¹

While Godwin remained at Bruges, he did not abandon himself to despair, but spent the winter in arranging the means of revenge. A few days before midsummer he put to sea with a small squadron; while a powerful armament at Sandwich, under the earls Radulf and Odda, watched his motions. The outlaw was unconscious of his danger; but he escaped in a storm, and precipitately returned to his former asylum. The royal commanders were dismissed for their negligence; and, while the council was debating on the appointment of their successors, the mariners (so loosely combined were the armaments of these times) returned to their respective homes. This dispersion of the fleet encouraged Godwin to renew his attempt; in the Channel he was met by Harold from Ireland; with their united squadrons they pillaged the coast, swept away the ships from the different harbours, advanced up the Thames, and sailed through the southern arch of the bridge at London. The royal fleet of fifty sail was ranged on the opposite side of the river; and a powerful army lined the left bank.

Godwin sent his submission to Edward, by whom it was sternly refused. But the king's reluctance was gradually subdued by the policy of Stigand, who insinuated that his troops were unwilling to shed the blood of their countrymen; and that it was folly to sacrifice the affections of his subjects to the interests of a few Normans. At length he extorted from the reluctant king a commission to negotiate with Godwin, and that instant the foreigners fled in despair. Robert, archbishop of Canterbury, and Ulf, bishop of Dorchester, mounting their horses, fought their way through their opponents, rode to Ness, in Essex, and seizing a small and shattered bark, committed themselves to the mercy of the waves. The others dispersed in different directions; and by the connivance of Edward's friends escaped with their lives, though they were compelled to quit the kingdom. By their flight the principal obstacle to an accommodation was removed. Godwin received permission to visit the king. He laid the blame of the late dissensions on the Normans, attested in the most solemn manner the innocence of himself and his children, and surrendered as pledges for his loyalty his son Wulfnoth, and his nephew Haco. Edward received him kindly, but for greater security sent the hostages to be kept by William of Normandy. The foreign favourites were outlawed by decree of the great council; Godwin and Harold recovered their earldoms; and Editha was recalled from her prison to the throne.² But to Sweyn Edward was inexorable. He had been guilty of a most inhuman and perfidious murder; and seeing himself abandoned by his family, he submitted to the discipline of the ecclesiastical canons. He walked, a barefoot pilgrim, from Flanders to

¹ Ingulf, 65. Flor. 627. Hemmingford, 456. Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1052.

² Chron. Sax. 165—166. Flor. 627, 628.

Palestine; visited with tears of compunction the holy places; and finished his penance and his life in the province of Lycia.¹

The services of the negotiator on this occasion were not forgotten by the Godwins. He had expelled Archbishop Robert: he succeeded to the honours of that prelate. Without learning, without any of the virtues becoming his profession, Stigand, even under a religious monarch, arrived at the highest dignity in the English church. His only merit was an aptitude for intrigue and the art of profiting by every occurrence. He had been originally noticed by Canute, and appointed one of the royal chaplains. By the intervention of friends, and the aid of presents, he became bishop of Helmstan: from Helmstan he was successively removed to Selsey and Winchester; and now obtained the great object of his ambition, the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury. To his unspeakable mortification, Pope Leo IX. could not be persuaded that a church was vacant, of which the bishop was still alive, and refused to surrender his rights.² But the vigilance of Stigand never slept; John of Velitræ, under the name of Benedict, usurped the papacy for a few months; and it was no difficult matter for one intruder to obtain the pallium from another. However, Benedict was soon expelled, and Alexander II. suspended Stigand from the exercise of the episcopal functions. Still, under the patronage of Harold, he contrived to deceive the simplicity of Edward; and his avarice absorbed at the same time the revenues not only of the churches of Canterbury and Winchester, but also of the monasteries of St. Augustine's, St. Alban's, Ely, and Glastonbury.³

Godwin did not long survive the disgrace of his enemies. He died the following Easter (15th April, 1053); and the story, which was invented by the malice of party, would persuade us that his death was a visible judgment of Heaven on the murderer of Alfred. He was sitting, we are told, at table with the king. Observing a servant, who had chanced to make a false step, support himself with his other foot, he exclaimed—"See, how one brother assists another!"—"Yes," replied Edward, looking sternly at the earl, "and if Alfred were now alive, he might also assist me." Godwin felt the reproach, loudly protested his innocence, and with the most solemn execrations wished that, if he were guilty, he might not live to eat the morsel which he held in his hand. He put it to his mouth, and immediately expired.⁴ Such is the tale in its most improved state. At its first publication the preparatory incident, and the remark of Edward, appear to have been forgotten.⁵ The real fact is, that Godwin on Easter Monday fell speechless from the royal table; that he was carried by his three sons into the king's chamber; and that, after lingering for some time in great torment, he died on the following Thursday.⁶ His earldom was given to Harold: that of Harold to Algar, the son of Leofric.

The character of this powerful earl has been painted by most of our historians in colours of blood. They describe him as a monster of inhumanity, duplicity, and ambition. But

¹ Malm. 46.

² Robert had gone to Rome, and in his return with a papal letter, died at Jumieges, an abbey in Normandy.—Malm. 46.

³ Chron. Sax. 167, 168, 169, 170. Hist. Elien. 615. Mail. 158. Spel. Con. 628. Vit. S. Wulst. 251. Guil. Flot. 105. Ing. 69. Malm. 116.

⁴ Higden, 280. Radborn, 239. West. 215. Brompton, 943; according to whom the person who made the false step was Harold, Godwin's son, and cup-bearer to the king.

⁵ Ingulf, 66. Malm. 45.

⁶ Chron. Sax. 168. Mailros, 158. Flor. 628.

their credit is lessened by the consideration that they wrote after the Conquest, when every artifice was adopted to persuade the English, that the man whom the Norman had precipitated from the throne, was, on account of his own crimes and those of his father, unworthy to remain on it. To their defamation may be opposed the panegyric of Edward's biographer, who dedicated his work to Editha. If we may believe him, the earl was the father of the people, the support of the nation. To the peaceful and virtuous he was kind, generous, and placable; but the turbulent and lawless trembled at his lion-like countenance, and dreaded the severity of his justice. The English lamented his death as a national calamity, and placed their only consolation in his son Harold, the inheritor of his father's virtues no less than of his honours.¹ Probably the truth will be found between the exaggerated encomiums of one party and the undistinguishing invectives of the other.

Though the late disturbances had interrupted the general tranquillity, they had been terminated without bloodshed, and had inflicted no considerable injury on the people. The principal calamities of Edward's reign were pestilence and famine, evils which, at this period, occasionally visited every part of Europe. As long as agriculture was in its infancy, each unfavourable season was followed by a year of scarcity; and while the intercourse between nations was rare and insecure, the wants of one people could not be relieved from the plenty of another. The chroniclers of the age frequently complain of the inclemency of the seasons, of earthquakes, which, on one occasion, created considerable alarm at Derby and at Worcester, of the distress caused by the failure of the crops, and of contagious distempers which afflicted not only the cattle, but also the human race.² The benevolent heart of Edward mourned over the calamities of his people, and he eagerly adopted every expedient which seemed likely to remove or to mitigate their sufferings. The Dane-gelt had now been paid for eight-and-thirty years; it formed a considerable part of the royal revenue. In 1051 the king resolved to sacrifice this advantage to the relief of the people; and the abolition of so odious an impost was received by them with every demonstration of gratitude. On another occasion, when his nobles had raised a large sum on their vassals, and begged him to accept the free gift of his faithful subjects, he refused the present as extorted from the labour of the poor, and commanded it to be restored to the original contributors.³

The only foreign war in which the king engaged was against an usurper, whose infamy has been immortalized by the genius of Shakspeare. In 1039 Duncan, king of Scotland, was murdered by Macbeth. A prince driven by force from the throne of his fathers might justly claim the sympathy of Edward; and Malcolm, the son of Duncan, received from him the permission to vindicate his rights with the aid of an English army. For fifteen years the power of the murderer discouraged every attempt; and the fugitive resided with his uncle Siward, earl of Northumberland. But when Macduff, the thane of Fife, unfurled the royal standard, Malcolm hastened to the insurgents; Siward accom-

¹ Vit. Ed. apud Stow, 97. These opposite accounts so perplexed Malmesbury, that he knew not what to believe or what to reject.—Malmes. 46.

² Chron. Sax. 157, 169. Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1049, 1059. Mailros, 157. In the year 1049 we are told that much corn and many farms in Derbyshire were destroyed by the wild-fire (Chron. Lamb. ad ann.), or, as it is termed in the Chron. of Mailros, by the wood-fire (ignis aereus vulgo dictus silvaticus).—Mail. 157.

³ Ing. 65. Mailros, 127. Hovenden, 256.

panied him with a powerful force; and the victory of Lanfanan, in Aberdeenshire, by the fall of Macbeth, placed the crown on the head of the rightful heir. Among those who perished in the action was the son of Siward. The hero anxiously inquired in what manner the young man had fallen; and being assured that his wounds were received in front, exclaimed that he was satisfied, and wished for himself no better fate. Soon after his return, Siward was attacked by a disorder which proved mortal; but he declared that he would die as he had lived, like a warrior; and ordering his arms to be brought, breathed his last, sitting upright on his bed, and leaning upon his spear.¹ His son Waltheof was too young to exercise the authority of his father; and the earldom was given to Tostig, the brother of Harold.

While the earl of Northumberland was yet in Scotland, the flames of civil war had burst out in England. They seem to have been kindled by the jealousy of Harold, who was indignant that the earldom which he had resigned for that of Godwin, should be given to the rival family of Leofric. At the witena-gemot Alfgar was accused of treason "against the king and the country." Most of our chroniclers assert his innocence: ² a writer, who seems devoted to the interests of Harold, declares that his guilt was established on the most satisfactory evidence.³ Outlawed by the judgment of the council, Alfgar fled to Ireland, purchased the assistance of a northern sea-king, was joined by Griffith, prince of Wales, and poured his Welsh and Norwegian auxiliaries into the county of Hereford. The earl Radulf, with his retainers, fled at the first onset: the city was taken and pillaged; four hundred of the inhabitants were slain; and the cathedral with the principal buildings were burnt. To revenge this insult the king assembled an army at Gloucester, at the head of which Harold chased the invaders into the fastnesses of Snowdon. A negotiation followed, which restored to Alfgar his former honours. His allies marched immediately to Leicester; and Leofric, who appears to have remained an idle spectator during the contest, was impelled by apprehension or by gratitude to reward their services at its termination. But Leofric died soon afterwards (30th September, 1057); and Alfgar succeeded to the honours of his father. The former jealousy, and former accusations were immediately revived. Alfgar again lost his earldom; and was again restored by the arms of Griffith and the Norwegians. But he hardly enjoyed his triumph during a year; and at his death left two sons, Morcar and Edwin, whose unmerited fate will claim the sympathy of the reader.⁴

¹ I may be allowed to observe that, with respect to this event, Lord Hailes (Annals of Scotland, p. 2) appears to have overlooked the statements of our most ancient historians. He tells us that "Siward, with the approbation of his sovereign, led the Northumbrians to the aid of Malcolm, but did not live to see the event of his enterprise;" they say, that he defeated Macbeth, and placed Malcolm on the throne, as Edward had ordered. Siwardus jussu Regis Edwardi et equestri exercitu et classe valida Scotiam adiit, et cum rege Scottorum Macbetha prælum commisit, ac multis millibus Scottorum et Normannis omnibus, quorum supra mentionem fecimus, occisis, illum fugavit, et Malcolmum, ut rex jusserat, regem constituit.—Sim. Dun. 187. Florence, p. 629, repeats the same words. Mailros, p. 158, has the same in substance. See also Malmesbury: Macbetha vita regnoque spoliavit, Malcolmum regem instituit (f. 44). Huntingdon: Regem bello vicit, regnum totum destruxit, destructum sibi subjugavit (f. 209). Lambard's Saxon Chronicle: "Siward went with a great army into Scotland, both with ship-force and land-force, and fought with the Scots, and routed the king Macbeth, and slew all the best in the land, and brought thence much spoil, such as no man ever got before."—Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1054.

² Ing. 67. Mail. 158. Flor. 629.

³ Chron. Sax. 169.

⁴ Ingulf, 66. Mailros, 158. Flor. 629, 630.

The death of Alfgar exposed Griffith to the just resentment of Harold. The Welsh prince and his subjects had long deserved the name and punishment of robbers and assassins. From the recesses of their mountains they had made annual incursions on the inhabitants of the borders; had indulged in plunder, bloodshed, and conflagration; and had eluded the pursuit of vengeance by the celerity of their retreat. When Rhese, the brother of Griffith, fell into the hands of the English, even the meekness of Edward, "whom no injuries could irritate,"¹ ordered him to be put to death; and the king now commissioned Harold to inflict a severe punishment on those persevering robbers. Aware of the difficulties arising from the nature of the country and the fleetness of the enemy, Harold selected a numerous body of young men, vigorous and active, bade them exchange their usual arms for others of less weight and dimensions; and gave them for defence helmets and targets of hardened leather. In the depth of winter he attempted by a sudden irruption to surprise Griffith; but the Welshman escaped, though his ships and mansion were consigned to the flames. At the beginning of summer, Tostig, with a body of cavalry, entered Wales from the north: Harold conveyed his troops by sea, and landed them on the coast. The indefatigable earl, who proceeded on foot, and fared like the meanest of his followers, traversed the country in every direction.

Neither mountains nor morasses could screen the natives from the pursuit of their enemy. Wherever the Welsh offered any resistance, he was victorious; and to perpetuate the memory of each victory, he erected a pyramid of stone with this inscription: HERE HAROLD CONQUERED. Overpowered and dismayed, they solicited for mercy; and sent as a peace-offering the head of Griffith to the conqueror (Aug. 5). Harold returned in triumph to Edward: the head of the Welshman with the beak and the ornaments of his ship were presented to the English monarch; and his two uterine brothers Blethyn and Rywallon swore fealty, and engaged to pay the ancient tribute. A law was passed condemning every Welshman, found in arms on the east of Offa's dyke, to lose his right hand; and the natives of the mountains, taught by fatal experience, respected during the four next reigns the territory of their neighbours.²

It is probable that the objection of the witan to the king's intended pilgrimage had directed his attention to his nephew and namesake Edward, the exiled son of his brother Edmund Ironside. That prince still lived in Hungary, and had married a lady of the imperial family,³ who bore to him three children, Edgar, Margaret, and Christina. There could be no doubt that he was rightful heir to the crown on the death of the king without children: and Aldred, bishop of Worcester, was sent in 1054 with valuable presents, on an embassy to the emperor

¹ Malm. 44.

² Gir. Camb. in Ang. Sac. ii. 541. Ingulf, 68. Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1063. The Chronicle says the Welsh princes swore fealty, and gave hostages to the king and the earl. Why to the earl? Had he been appointed Edward's successor? or did they merely become his vassals? At the same time, and by the same authority, Meredith was appointed prince of South Wales.—Powel, 103.

³ The Saxon Chronicle (ann. 1017) tells us that Agathawas Caeþape mæga, but does not specify how nearly she was related to the emperor. If we believe Malmesbury (i. 303) and Wendover (i. 463), she was sister to Gisela, the wife of Stephen of Hungary, and sister to the emperor Henry II. But the writers who, as Florence, Hoveden, and Ailred, call her the daughter of the brother of the emperor Henry, must have taken her for a daughter of Bruno, Henry's brother, who had quarrelled with that prince because he would not grant him the duchy of Bavaria, and had sought an asylum in Hungary. They were afterwards reconciled through the good offices of Gisela, and Bruno obtained the bishopric of Augsburg.

Henry III. to procure, through the influence of that prince, the return of the etheling from Hungary. Aldred spent an entire year, partly with Henry, partly with Heriman, archbishop of Cologne; but his efforts were unsuccessful, perhaps on account of the hostile feeling which existed between the emperor and Andrew, king of Hungary. But in 1056 the first of those princes died; and Edward in the following year arrived with his family in London. There is something mysterious in the fate of this prince. In a short time he sickened and died: and though he had lived more than forty years in exile, though he had been invited to England by the king to perpetuate on the throne the royal race of Cerdic and Alfred, yet it was so contrived that the uncle and nephew never had an opportunity of seeing one the other. Will not this suggest, if it do not justify the suspicion, that there was some one who deemed it his interest to keep the etheling at a distance from the king? However that may be, the invitation sent to him in Hungary is a proof that up to this time Edward could not have made any engagement with William of Normandy to appoint that prince his successor.

About the close of the following year Aldred undertook and accomplished what had never yet been done by any Anglo-Saxon prelate. Travelling through Germany and Hungary, he reached Jerusalem, offered his prayers at the holy places, and left on the altar at the sepulchre a chalice of gold, of the weight of five marks.¹ Soon after his return, Kinsey, archbishop of York, died; and Aldred in the course of three days was appointed to succeed him, with permission to keep at the same time the bishopric of Worcester, as had been done by some of his predecessors. In a short time he proceeded to Rome, having in his company Tostig, earl of Northumbria, with his wife Judith, the daughter of Baldwin, earl of Flanders, and two bishops elect, Giso of Wells, and Walter of Hereford. The earl and his countess sought probably to gratify their curiosity or devotion, the bishops elect to obtain consecration abroad, because they could not obtain it at home, on account of the suspension of Stigand: Aldred had two objects in view,—to procure for himself the pallium, and for Edward the papal confirmation of certain new privileges which he had lately conferred on his new abbey of Westminster. Nicholas received them with honour; granted the confirmation solicited by the king, examined and consecrated the two bishops elect, and, though at first he refused the pallium to Aldred, because his election had been tainted with simony, granted it to him at last on condition that he should resign the bishopric of Worcester. Ermanfroi, bishop of Sion, with another cardinal, followed the pilgrims as papal legates to England, waited on the king at Westminster, and presided at the election of a new bishop at Worcester, which election, with Edward's permission, was conducted according to the strict letter of the canons. What proposals they made to Edward, and what answer they received from him at Easter by advice of the witan, we are ignorant. The new bishop of Worcester was Wulstan, prior of the cathedral, who received consecration from the hands of Aldred.²

By the course of events Harold was become the most powerful subject in

¹ Chron. Sax. ann. 1058. Wigorn, ann. 1058. Hoved. 255.

² Compare Malmesbury (De Pont. 154, 159) and Ang. Sso. ii. 280, with the Chronicle and Hoveden, ann. 1060. Aldred publicly acknowledged at the consecration that he claimed no jurisdiction within the southern province, and Wulstan made his promise of canonical obedience to the church of Canterbury.—Hoved. ibid.

England. After the death of Edward (surnamed the Outlaw), but one individual stood between him and the crown, the object of his ambition, Edgar, the son of that Edward, a young prince, feeble in body and still more feeble in mind, whose hereditary right was sunk in his inaptitude to govern. But the other side of the Channel exhibited a more formidable competitor, in the person of William, duke of Normandy. It was evident that by descent neither could boast the remotest claim. William was the illegitimate son of Robert, the nephew of Emma: Harold's only connection with the royal family arose from the marriage of his sister with Edward.¹ Their real title lay in their power and ambition: and in the latter William was equal, in the former he was superior to Harold. Unfortunately for the English earl, a vessel, in which he had sailed from Bosenham, was accidentally stranded in the mouth of the river Maye, on the opposite coast of Ponthieu. A barbarous custom had invested the lord of the district with a pretended right not only to the remains of the wreck, but also to the persons of the survivors: nor were imprisonments, threats, and torments spared to extort from the captives an exorbitant ransom. Harold and his companions were seized on the beach, conducted to the earl Guy, by whom they were immured within his castle of Beaurain. No circumstance could have been more propitious to the views of William. He demanded the prisoners: they were surrendered to him at Eu, in Normandy; and the compliance of Guy was rewarded with a valuable donation of land. In the Norman court Harold was treated with respect and munificence: but he enjoyed only the semblance of liberty, and soon had reason to regret the dungeons of Beaurain. Compelled by the necessity of his situation, he consented to do homage for his lands and honours to William, as the apparent successor of Edward. But the jealousy of the Norman required more than the mere ceremony of homage. Before an assembly of his barons, Harold was constrained to swear that he would promote the succession of the duke to the English crown, that he would guard his interests in the court of Edward, and that he would admit a Norman garrison into his castle of Dover. At length, loaded with presents, but distressed in mind, he was permitted to leave the territory of his rival. He had obtained from the gratitude of William the liberation of his nephew Haco, one of the hostages whom

¹ For the satisfaction of the reader, I shall subjoin a short genealogy of William's descent from Rollo, the first duke of Normandy.

The descent of Harold can be traced no farther back than his grandfather Wulfnoth, "child of Sussex." His father Godwin had married Gyda, the sister of Ulfr, brother-in-law to Canute. Of the connection between Godwin and Ulfr, Mr. Turner has given from the Knytlinge Saga an account, which savours more of romance than of history.

Edward had formerly required from Godwin; Wulfnoth, the other, was detained by the policy of the Norman, as a security for the faith of his brother.¹

That Harold was thus delivered up by the earl of Ponthieu, and was compelled to swear fealty to William, are indisputable facts; but the object which originally induced him to put to sea, is a subject of doubt and investigation. By the Norman writers, and those who follow them, we are told, that Edward, moved by gratitude and relationship, had appointed William his successor, and that Harold was sent to notify this appointment to the duke.² Nor, indeed, is it improbable that such a report should be circulated in Normandy, as a justification for the violence which was offered to Harold. Many of the English historians have preserved, or invented, a different account. If we may believe them, the earl intended to visit William, but his object was to solicit the liberty of the hostages, Haco and Wulfnoth.³ It is, however, difficult to conceive that a man ambitious of a crown, would, for the freedom of two captives, trust himself and the success of his projects to the mercy of a rival. Perhaps it were more safe to rely on the authority of those writers who appear ignorant of both these reports; and who describe the voyage of Harold as an occasional excursion along the coast, from which he was driven by a storm on the barbarous territory of Ponthieu.⁴

It was about the end of summer, when the earl returned to England; ⁵ his services were immediately required by an insurrection of the Northumbrians. Tostig had governed that people with the rapacity of a despot, and the cruelty of a barbarian. In the preceding year he had perfidiously murdered two of the noblest thanes in his palace at York; at his request Editha had ordered the assassination of Gospatric in Edward's court; and the recent imposition of an extraordinary tax, as it was universally felt, had armed the whole population against his government. In the beginning of October the insurgents surprised York. Tostig fled; his treasures and armoury were pillaged; his guards, to the number of two hundred, both Danes and English, with their commanders, Amund and Ravenswarth, were made prisoners, conducted out of the city, and massacred in cold blood on the north bank of the Ouse. Elated with their success, the insurgents chose for their future earl, Morcar, the son of Alfgar; and that nobleman, with the men of Lincoln, Nottingham, and Derbyshire, and his brother Edwin with those of Leicester, and a body of Welsh auxiliaries, advanced as far south as Northampton. Here they were met by Harold. When he inquired into the nature of their demands, they replied, that they were freemen, and would not tamely submit to oppression; that they required the confirmation of the laws of Canute, and the appointment of Morcar to the earldom of Northumberland. Harold returned, and obtained the royal assent to their requests; but during his absence and at their departure, they plundered the country, burnt the villages, and carried away several hundreds of the inhabitants, who were destined to a life of slavery, unless their ransom should be afterwards

¹ See the account in William of Poitou, who received the particulars of the oath from persons who were present.—Guil. Pict. 79, 80, 85.

² Guil. Pict. 77. Order. Vit. 492. Wil. Gemet. 285.

³ Eadm. 4. Sim. Dunel. 195. Hemingford, 456.

⁴ Mat. Paris, 2. West. 218. Malm. 52.

⁵ No writer that I know has fixed the date of Harold's detention in Normandy; but we learn from Pictaviensis that the corn in Bretagne was almost ripe.—Pict. 81, 85.

paid by their friends. Tostig, dissatisfied with the pacification, repaired to Bruges, the usual asylum of his family.¹

If, on this occasion, Harold appeared to desert the cause of his brother, we may attribute his moderation, not only to the formidable appearance of the insurgents, but also to a prudent regard for his own interest. The king was hastening to the grave; and the success of the earl's projects required his presence in London, a period of tranquillity, and the good will of the people. He returned to the metropolis on the 30th November, five weeks before Edward breathed his last. The monarch previously to his decease had the satisfaction of witnessing the dedication of the church of Westminster, which had been the great object of his solicitude during his latter years. When the witan opposed his journey to Rome, Leo IX. authorized him to commute his intended pilgrimage for some other work of piety. With this view he set apart the tenth of his yearly revenue, and rebuilt from its foundation the church of St. Peter, at the western extremity of the capital. On the vigil of Christmas he was attacked by the fever which ultimately proved fatal. For three days he struggled against the violence of the disease, held his court as usual, and presided with affected cheerfulness at the royal banquets. On the festival of the Innocents, the day appointed for the dedication of the new church, he was unable to leave his chamber. The ceremony was, however, performed. Editha took the charge of the decorations, and represented the royal founder. But his absence, and the idea of his danger, diffused a deep gloom among the thousands who had assembled to witness the spectacle. After lingering a week longer, Edward died on the 5th of January, and was buried the following day with royal pomp in the church which he had erected.²

If we estimate the character of a sovereign by the test of popular affection, we must rank Edward among the best princes of his time. The goodness of his heart was adored by his subjects, who lamented his death with tears of undissembled grief, and bequeathed his memory as an object of veneration to their posterity. The blessings of his reign are the constant theme of our ancient writers; not, indeed, that he displayed any of those brilliant qualities, which attract admiration, while they inflict misery. He could not boast of the victories which he had won, or of the con-

¹ Chron. Sax. 171. Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1065. Flor. 633.

² Chron. Sax. 171. Spelm. Con. 628—637. Cum insigni regio.—Hist. Ram. 460. Ailred Riev. 398, 399. Here it may be asked whether Edward, before his death, did or did not appoint a successor? It is evident that he had looked on his nephew, Edward the Outlaw, as the rightful heir, and on that account sent for him from Hungary to England. At the death of that prince, in 1057, we are told that fears concerning the succession began to be entertained (spes regii sanguinis deinceps deficere cepit).—Ing. 66. Malm. ii. 2): but that it was not till 1065, the last year of his reign, that Edward abandoned the hope of placing on the throne Edgar, the son of his nephew.—Ing. 68. Whether during that year he appointed either William or Harold, must for ever remain uncertain. They both asserted it; but it was so much for the interest of each to have it believed, that neither can deserve credit.

It is observable that Ingulf, who was at the time absent on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, tells us, not that Harold, but that Robert of Canterbury, was sent to announce to William his appointment (p. 68); and yet Ingulf could not have been ignorant that Robert had been driven from England thirteen years before. William of Poitou (p. 44), another contemporary writer, assigns the same mission to Robert, when, by the advice of the witan, he conducted Wulfnoth and Haco as hostages to William. But we know that Robert, instead of conducting hostages, fled for his life: and that the hostages were given by Godwin after his departure. Can it be that Robert, on his return to Normandy, first suggested to William the idea of claiming the succession, and hence was supposed to have offered it by the commission of Edward?

quests which he had achieved ; but he exhibited the interesting spectacle of a king, negligent of his private interests, and totally devoted to the welfare of his people ; and by his labours to restore the dominion of the laws ; his vigilance to ward off foreign aggression ; his constant, and ultimately successful solicitude to appease the feuds of his nobles, if he did not prevent the interruption, he secured at least a longer duration of public tranquillity than had been enjoyed in England for half a century. He was pious, kind, and compassionate ; the father of the poor, and the protector of the weak ; more willing to give than to receive ; and better pleased to pardon than to punish.¹ Under the preceding kings, force generally supplied the place of justice, and the people were impoverished by the rapacity of the sovereign. But Edward enforced the laws of his Saxon predecessors, and disdained the riches which were wrung from the labours of his subjects. Temperate in his diet, unostentatious in his person, pursuing no pleasures but those which his hawks and hounds afforded, he was content with the patrimonial demesnes of the crown ; and was able to assert, even after the abolition of that fruitful source of revenue, the Dane-gelt, that he possessed a greater portion of wealth than any of his predecessors had enjoyed. To him the principle that the king can do no wrong, was literally applied by the gratitude of the people, who, if they occasionally complained of the measures of the government (and much reason they had to complain on account of the appointment to bishoprics of aspiring and rapacious adventurers), attributed the blame not to the monarch himself, of whose benevolence and piety they entertained no doubt, but to the ministers, who had abused his confidence, or deceived his credulity.²

It was, however, a fortunate circumstance for the memory of Edward, that he occupied the interval between the Danish and Norman conquests. Writers were induced to view his character with more partiality from the hatred with which they looked on his successors and predecessors. They were foreigners, he was a native ; they held the crown by conquest, he by descent ; they ground to the dust the slaves whom they had made, he became known to his countrymen only by his benefits. Hence he appeared to shine with a purer light amid the gloom with which he was surrounded ; and whenever the people under the despotism of the Norman kings had an opportunity of expressing their real wishes, they constantly called for "the laws and customs of the good King Edward."

He was the first of our princes who touched for the king's evil. The surname of "the Confessor" was given to him from the bull of his canonization, issued by Alexander III., about a century after his decease.

HAROLD.

By the death of Edward, Edgar the Etheling became the last surviving male of the race of Cerdic ; but, if his claim were ever mentioned, it was instantly abandoned.³ A report had been circulated that Edward, on his

¹ An uninteresting story told by Malmsbury has been brought forward to prove that the simplicity of Edward bordered on childishness, and that he was so ignorant as not to know that kings possessed the power of punishing offenders. The inference is not warranted by the original story, which merely asserts, that to a peasant who had broken the king's nets, Edward angrily said, "I will do as much to you, if I have an opportunity,"—Tantundem tibi nocebo, si potero.—Malm. 44.

² Hist. Ram. 450. Elien. 515. Malm. 44. Ingul. 69.

³ Quia puer tanto honori minus idoneus videbatur.—Alur. Riev. 336.

death-bed, had appointed Harold to be his successor.¹ He was proclaimed king in an assembly of the thanes and of the citizens of London; and the next day witnessed both the funeral of the late, and the coronation of the new sovereign. On account of the suspension of Stigand, the ceremony was performed by Aldred, the archbishop of York.² To Edgar, in lieu of the crown, was given the earldom of Oxford.

The southern counties cheerfully acquiesced in the succession of Harold; he was alarmed and perplexed by the hesitation of the Northumbrians. Their pride refused to be bound by the act of those whose military qualities they deemed inferior to their own; and they looked around for a chieftain, who would solicit their aid, and accept the crown from their hands. Harold hastened into the north; instead of an army he was accompanied by Wulstan, the venerable bishop of Worcester; by whose influence, combined with his own conciliatory conduct, he soon won the affections, and secured the obedience of the Northumbrians. His marriage with Editha, the daughter of Algar, bound to his interest her two brothers, the powerful earls Morcar and Edwin.³

The intelligence both of the death of Edward, and of the immediate coronation of Harold had been conveyed to Normandy by the same messenger. William assembled his council, informed them of the event, and expressed his determination to pursue by arms, his pretensions to the crown of England. An envoy was despatched to remind Harold of his former oath of fealty, and promise of assistance. The king replied that the oath had been extorted from him by force; that a promise to give a crown which did not belong to him, could not be binding; that he had been elected king by the free suffrage of the people; and that, when it should come to the trial, he would prove himself worthy of their choice. The message was such as Harold, the answer such as William, expected. Each had already determined to appeal to the sword; and the English no less than the Normans were astonished at the mighty preparations made to decide the important quarrel.⁴

It was unfortunate for Harold that he had to contend at the same time not only with William, but with his brother Tostig, the exiled earl of Northumberland, in whom he experienced a most bitter and enterprising adversary. The outlaw visited Normandy, and arranged a plan of co-operation with the duke; he sent messengers to the northern princes, and engaged the assistance of Harald Hardrada, the king of Norway; he collected a fleet of sixty sail at Bruges, and entering the Channel began the war by levying contributions in the Isle of Wight. But he retired upon the approach of his brother, and sailing round the South Foreland, directed his course to the north. In Lindesey he was defeated by Edwin; his mariners abandoned him in his distress; and Malcolm, king of Scotland, afforded him

¹ I am much inclined to believe this report, not only on the testimony of the English writers (Chron. Sax. 172. Hoved. 449. Eadmer, 5. Sim. Dun. 193. Al. Ber. 126. Flor. 633. Hist. Elien. 515), but because its truth is acknowledged by the enemies of Harold. Edvardi dono in ipsius fine.—Guil. Pict. 135. Ægrotus princeps concessit.—Order. Vit. 492.

² Ingulf, 68. Flor. 633. Hist. Elien. 515. In a fact, which publicly took place in England, the native writers are more entitled to credit than foreigners. The Normans say Harold was crowned by Stigand (non sancta consecratione Stigandi.—Guil. Pict. 105); and the statement is supported by the figures on the tapestry of Bayeux (Lancelot, 421). But they give us only the reports prevalent in Normandy; and William, anxious to interest the religion of his subjects in his own favour, would readily countenance the notion that his rival had been crowned by a suspended prelate.

³ Ang. Sac. ii. 253.

⁴ Ing. 68. Eadm. 5. Matt. Paris. Malm. 56.

an asylum till the arrival of his Norwegian ally.¹ The armament under Hardrada was not ready for sea till the month of August; when the Norwegian monarch, leaving the regency of the kingdom to his son Magnus, embarked with his family and a gallant army in a fleet of three hundred sail. His queen Elizabeth and her two daughters, fearing the dangers of the campaign, were set on shore at the Orkneys; and Hardrada, according to agreement, was joined by Tostig with a few ships at the mouth of the Tyne. Their first object was to obtain possession of York; and with this view they entered the Humber and ascended the Ouse. A desperate attempt to save that capital was made at Fulford by the earls Edwin and Morcar. The Norwegian had drawn up his men with their right flank to the river, and their left to a morass. The impetuosity of the English burst through the line; but they in their turn were overwhelmed by a fresh body of forces from the ships: and more of the fugitives perished in the water than had fallen by the sword. Edwin and Morcar escaped to York; negotiations were opened; and the mutual exchange of one hundred and fifty hostages shows, that the province was conditionally surrendered to the invaders.²

Harold had completed his preparations, and having selected a position between Pevensey and Hastings, awaited with confidence the threatened descent of the Norman. The unexpected invasion of Hardrada disconcerted his projects. Trusting, however, to his fortune, and encouraged by the tempestuous state of the weather, he lost not a moment in marching against the aggressor, and arrived in the neighbourhood of York within four days after the late battle.

Unconscious of danger, Hardrada had left one part of his forces on board the fleet, while he marched with the other for the purpose of dividing and regulating the province which he had conquered. In this employment he was overtaken by the indefatigable Harold. Surprised, but not dismayed, the Norwegian sent three messengers to the fleet to hasten the march of his men, while he retired slowly to Stanfordsbridge, on the Derwent. There he drew up his warriors in a compact but hollow circle. The royal standard occupied the centre; the circumference was composed of spearmen. The whole was surrounded by a line of spears firmly fixed in the earth, and pointed outwards in an oblique direction.

The Icelandic historian has preserved some curious anecdotes respecting this celebrated battle. Hardrada wore a blue mantle and a glittering helmet. As he rode round the circle, his horse fell. "Who," exclaimed Harold, "is that chieftain on the ground?" Being told it was Hardrada, "He is," returned the king, "a gallant warrior; but his fall shows that his fate is approaching." Soon afterwards a messenger came from the English monarch with an offer of the earldom of Northumberland to Tostig. "The proposal," said the outlaw, "should have been made some months ago. But if I accept it, what will my brother give to the king of Norway?" "Seven feet of land for a grave," was the contemptuous reply. Tostig scorned to abandon his friend.

The English cavalry were accustomed to charge in irregular masses; and, if they met with resistance, to disperse in every direction, and reassemble upon a given point. The firm array of the Norwegians bade defiance to all their efforts; and Harold with his great superiority of force might yet have been foiled, had not the ardour of the enemy seduced them to break their ranks and pursue the fugitive cavalry. That instant the English rushed into the opening; and in the confusion Hardrada was shot through the neck with an arrow. He fell instantly; and Tostig assumed the command. A second offer from Harold was indignantly refused; the arrival of the expected aid revived the fainting spirits of the Norwegians; and a desperate but unavailing effort was made to wrest the victory out of the hands of the English. The battle was continued by the obstinacy of the enemy long after every reasonable hope of success had been extinguished; and it was only terminated by the death of Tostig, and of every celebrated chieftain in the Norwegian army. This action is considered as one of the most bloody that is recorded in our annals; and at the distance of fifty years the spot was still whitened with the bones of the slain.¹

¹ Chron. Sax. 172. Malm. 52. Hunt. 210. Snorre, iii. 146. Order. Vit. apud Duchesne, 469, 492. Gemetic. 285.

² Chron. Sax. 172. Snorre, 153 — 162. Flor. 634. Higden, 284.

The courage of Harold was tempered with humanity. He sent for Olave, the younger son of Hardrada, who, accompanied by his bishop and the earl of the Orkneys, obeyed the summons of the conqueror. He experienced a courteous reception; swore to live in amity with England; and was dismissed with twelve ships to revisit his native country. A few days were necessarily employed by Harold in taking possession of the Norwegian fleet, securing the spoil, and refreshing his exhausted troops. He repaired to York: but the public rejoicing of the citizens could not tranquillize his impatience to learn the motions of his remaining and most formidable competitor. The king was seated at the royal banquet, and surrounded by his thanes, when a messenger entered the hall, and announced the arrival and descent of the Normans on the coast of Sussex. The battle of Stanford-bridge had been fought on the twenty-seventh, William effected his landing on the twenty-ninth, of September.²

That prince had employed eight months in the most active preparations for the invasion. By the gravest of his counsellors it was deemed a most hazardous enterprise: but his confidence was not to be shaken by their suggestions; and the people, catching the spirit, seconded with all their zeal the exertions of their duke. Nor was this enthusiasm confined to his own subjects. Bretons, Poitevins, Burgundians, and warriors from every province of France, crowded to his standard; and by the beginning of August he found himself at the head of fifty thousand cavalry, besides a smaller body of infantry.³ All had been taught to believe that they were called to fight in the cause of justice against an usurper, of religion against a perjured traitor. Whatever claim other individuals

¹ Snorre, 156—165. Ing. 69. Chron. Sax. 172. Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1066. Hunt. 210. Order. Vit. apud Maseres, 174. Tostig had married Judith, the daughter of Baldwin, earl of Flanders. She afterwards espoused the son of Azo and Cunegunda, Guelph I. or V., from whom in a direct line the present royal family of England is descended. But I do not find that her first husband Tostig ever took the title of king of England, as is supposed by Gibbon, Miscel. Works, iii. 193.

² Hunt. 210. Hist. Rames. 462. The printed chronicle (172) says, William landed on Michaelmas day, and this I conceive to be the meaning of Orderic, who says he crossed the sea on the night preceding (175). I cannot, however, agree with Orderic (184), or with Gemeticensis (vii. 34), that the battle of Stanford-bridge was fought on the 7th of October. The English writers place it on the 25th or 27th of September.

³ Millia militum quinquaginta.—Pict. 106. Virorum sexaginta millia.—Id. 112. Quinquaginta millia militum, cum copia peditum.—Orderic, 174. These passages plainly prove that the milites fought on horseback.

might prefer to the crown of England, Harold, the man, the liege subject of William, could not lawfully withhold it from his lord. To strengthen these impressions, the duke had sent an embassy to Pope Alexander III., from whom he had received a consecrated banner. This might be no more than a return of politeness on the part of the pontiff: but to the troops it was represented as the sanction of their intended expedition¹ by the head of their church.

To furnish transports for this numerous body of men, for their arms, horses, and provisions, every vessel in Normandy had been put in requisition. But the supply was still inadequate; and many individuals sought the favour of their prince by building others at their own expense in the different harbours and creeks. The general rendezvous was appointed at the mouth of the Dive, a small river which flows into the sea between the broader streams of the Orne and the Touques; and in the month of August its shallow estuary was covered with one thousand, or according to some historians, with three thousand, vessels of every size and description.² Still the success of the enterprise depended much on the caprice of the weather. As soon as the army was prepared to embark, the wind veered to the north-east; and for more than a month it continued stationary at the same point. It was not till the approach of the equinox that a breeze from the west released the fleet from its tedious confinement. The Normans eagerly seized the opportunity of putting to sea; but the wind gradually became more violent; the skill of the mariners was baffled by the turbulence of the elements and by the fears of the soldiers; and though a great part of the fleet reached St. Valery, near Dieppe, the whole coast was covered with fragments of wreck and the bodies of the drowned.³ This was a severe check to the impatience of William. He laboured to interest Heaven in his behalf: the shrine of St. Valery was carried in procession; and the whole army joined in public supplications for a favourable wind. At last their wishes were gratified; and the duke led the way with a lantern suspended from the head of the mast, as a guide to his followers, during the darkness of the night: but so unequal was their speed, that when he had reached the English shore, the others were scattered in different directions over a line of twenty leagues from one coast to the other. In this situation they would have offered an easy victory to the fleet of Harold: but unfortunately it had previously dispersed to procure provisions; and the different squadrons had been detained in port by the violence of the weather.⁴ The Normans landed without opposition at Pevensey (Sept. 29), marched immediately to Hastings, and threw up fortifications, at both places, to protect their transports, and secure a retreat in case of disaster.⁵ Nor was the precaution use-

¹ Pict. 106, 107. Malm. 56.

² Pict. 109. Gemet. p. 685. Malm. iii. 56. The duke's ship was a present from his wife Matilda. On the prow was in image of gold, representing a boy, who with his right hand pointed to England, and with his left held a trumpet of ivory to his mouth.—Lyt. Hist. vol. i. app. out of an ancient MS. p. 463, also at the end of Taylor's Gavelkind.

³ Pict. 108. Order. 175.

⁴ Flor. 634. The fleet separated on the 8th of August, but assembled again within a fortnight after the arrival of the Normans.

⁵ Quæ sibi forent receptaculo, et navibus propugnaculo.—Order. Vit. apud Maseres, 175. The custodia navium is also mentioned by Pictaviensis, p. 112. Hence the assertion of later writers, that he burnt all his ships, must be unfounded. I suspect the fear of losing them was the reason that he never ventured from the coast, till after the decisive battle of Hastings.

less. Within a few days the two ports were blockaded by the whole navy of England.¹

In this emergency the conduct of Harold has been severely censured. It is alleged that, intoxicated with his late success, he deemed himself invincible: that by his avarice in appropriating to himself the spoils of the Norwegians, he deprived the country of the services of his veterans; and that by his imprudence he wantonly staked the independence of England on the exertions of a handful of men, hastily collected, and unpractised in warfare. Perhaps these charges have no other foundation than the prejudices of writers, who sought to console their own pride and that of their readers, by ascribing the subjugation of the country to the incapacity of its ruler. On the receipt of the intelligence the king flew to the capital. It is probable that before his march to the north he had left directions for troops to assemble at London in the case of invasion: it is certain that thousands hastened to his standard, and that in six days he thought himself a match for his rival.² In the beginning of October he was feasting at York: on the fourteenth of the same month he had reached the camp of the Normans. But no celerity could surprise the vigilance of William. His scouts brought him advice of the approach of the English. He made immediate preparations for the impending combat; recalled the detachments which had been sent out to plunder, and retiring to his tent, attended at mass, and received the communion.³

In the casuistry of that age no crime was reckoned more shameful or more atrocious than the treason of a vassal against his lord; and William seems to have been powerfully impressed with the notion, which had been so industriously propagated amongst his troops, that Heaven would not fail to avenge upon Harold the violation of his oath. When he was told that the king of England accompanied the army, he expressed his astonishment that a man, conscious of the guilt of perjury, should venture his person in battle.⁴ The same sentiment was prevalent among the English. The brothers of Harold earnestly entreated him to absent himself from the field. "You have sworn," they said, "fealty to William: you cannot lawfully fight against a prince, to whom, in the name of God, you have promised submission. Leave

¹ The Norman writers, anxious to exaggerate the forces of the conquered, made the English fleet amount to 700 sail.—Pict. 127. Vit. 177.

² Within these six days we are told that messages were exchanged between the two rivals. An English monk, on the part of Harold, acknowledged the prior right of William; but maintained that Edward had, on his death-bed, left the crown to Harold, and that the last disposition had revoked the former. A monk of Fecamp replied, on the part of William, that Edward had given him the crown by the advice of his witan; that Godwin, Stigand, Leofric, and Siward had sworn to allow no other prince to succeed; that hostages had been given for the execution of their oaths; that Harold had afterwards, at the command of Edward, taken upon himself a similar obligation; that William had no objection to submit his claim to the decision of the laws, either English or Norman; or that, if his rival preferred it, he was ready to meet him in single combat. Harold merely replied, that God should judge between them.—Pict. 112—126. I distrust the whole of this story. Reasons have already been adduced to make it doubtful, whether Edward the Confessor ever promised the succession to William; and the arrival of Edward the Outlaw as the presumptive heir to the crown in 1057, shows that the assertions said to have been made by the monk of Fecamp, are in all probability false.

³ This circumstance probably gave occasion to the statement of Malmesbury (56, 57), that the English spent the night before the battle in drinking, the Normans in prayer. The fact is, that Harold hastened to take the enemy unawares; and partly succeeded, as several detachments had gone out to plunder in the morning before his approach was known.—Pict. 127.

⁴ Taylor's Ann. 192.

to us the direction of the battle. We are bound by no oaths. We know nothing of the Norman except as the enemy of our country." The king laughed at their apprehensions.¹

The spot which he had selected for this important contest was called Senlac, nine miles from Hastings, an eminence opening to the south, and covered on the back by an extensive wood (Oct. 14).² As his troops arrived, he posted them on the declivity in one compact and immense mass. In the centre waved the royal standard, the figure of a warrior in the act of fighting, worked in thread of gold, and ornamented with precious stones. By its side stood Harold and his two brothers, Gurth and Leofwin; and around them the rest of the army, every man on foot. In this arrangement the king seems to have adopted, as far as circumstances would permit, the plan which had lately proved so fatal to the Norwegians, and which now, from the same causes, was productive of a similar result. Probably he feared the shock of the numerous cavalry of the Normans. Both men and horses were completely cased in armour, which gave to their charge an irresistible weight, and rendered them almost invulnerable to ordinary weapons. For the purpose of opposing them with more chance of success, Harold had brought with him engines to discharge stones into their ranks, and had recommended to his soldiers to confine themselves in close fight to the use of the battle-axe, a heavy and murderous weapon.

On the opposite hill, William was employed in marshalling his host. In the front he placed the archers and bowmen: the second line was composed of heavy infantry clothed in coats of mail; and behind these the duke arranged, in five divisions, the hope and the pride of the Norman force, the knights and men-at-arms. That he would strive both by words and actions to infuse into this multitude of warriors from different nations an ardour similar to his own, is not improbable; but the two harangues which William of Poitou, and Henry of Huntingdon, have put into his mouth, may with equal probability be attributed to the ingenuity of the writers. This only we know from himself, that in the hearing of his barons, he made a solemn vow to God, that if he gained the victory, he would found a church for the common benefit of all his followers. About nine in the morning the army began to move, crossed the interval between the two hills, and slowly ascended the eminence on which the English were posted. The papal banner, as an omen of victory, was carried in the front by Toustain the Fair, a dangerous honour, which two of the Norman barons had successively declined.³

At the moment when the armies were ready to engage, the Normans raised the national shout of "God is our help," which was as loudly answered by the adverse cry of "Christ's rood, the holy rood." The archers, after the discharge of their arrows, retired to the infantry, whose weak and extended line was unable to make any impression on their more numerous opponents. William ordered the cavalry to charge. The shock was terrible: but the English in every point opposed a solid and impenetrable mass. Neither buckler nor corslet could withstand the stroke of the battle-axe, wielded by a powerful arm

¹ Order. Vit. 176. Malm. 56.

² Some writers have supposed the name was derived from Sanguelac, or the lake of blood, in allusion to the carnage made in this battle. But Orderic assures us that Senlac was the ancient name: Locus, qui Senlac antiquitus vocabatur.—Order. 178.

³ Pict. 127. Hunt. 210, 211. Orderic, 178. He made the vow ad eorum corda robora.—New Rym. i. 4.

and with unerring aim; and the confidence of the Normans melted away at the view of their own loss, and the bold countenance of their enemies. After a short pause the horse and foot of the left wing betook themselves to flight; their opponents eagerly pursued; and a report was spread that William himself had fallen. The whole army began to waver; when the duke, with his helmet in his hand, rode along the line, exclaiming: "I am still alive, and, with the help of God, I still shall conquer." The presence and confidence of their commander revived the hopes of the Normans; and the speedy destruction of the English, who had pursued the fugitives, was fondly magnified into an assurance of victory. These brave but incautious men had, on their return, been intercepted by a numerous body of cavalry; and on foot and in confusion they quickly disappeared beneath the swords or rather the horses of the enemy. Not a man survived the carnage.

William led his troops again to the attack; but the English column, dense and immovable as a rock amidst the waves, resisted every assault. Disappointed and perplexed, the Norman had recourse to a stratagem, suggested by his success in the earlier part of the day. He ordered a division of horse to flee: they were pursued; and the temerity of the pursuers was punished with instant destruction. The same feint was tried with equal success in another part of the field. These losses might diminish the numbers of the English: but the main body obstinately maintained its position; and bade defiance to every effort of the Normans.¹

During the engagement William had given the most signal proofs of personal bravery. Three horses had been killed under him; and he had been compelled to grapple on foot with his adversaries. Harold also had animated his followers, both by word and example, and displayed a courage worthy of the crown for which he was fighting. His brothers Gurth and Leofwin had perished already; but as long as he survived, no man entertained the apprehension of defeat or admitted the idea of flight. A little before sunset an arrow shot at random entered his eye. He instantly fell; and the knowledge of his fall relaxed the efforts of the English. Twenty Normans undertook to seize the royal banner; and effected their purpose, but with the loss of half their number. One of them, who maimed with his sword the dead body of the king, was afterwards disgraced by William for his brutality. At dusk the English broke up, and dispersed through the wood. The Normans followed their track by the light of the moon, when ignorance of the country led them to a spot intersected with ditches, into which they were precipitated in the ardour of pursuit. The fugitives, recalled by the accident, inflicted a severe vengeance on their adversaries. As William, attracted by the cries of the combatants, was hastening to the place, he met Eustace of Boulogne and fifty knights fleeing with all their speed. He called on them to stop; but the earl, while he was in the act of whispering into the ear of the duke, received a stroke on the back which forced the blood out of his mouth and nostrils. He was carried in a state of insensibility to his tent; William's intrepidity hurried him forward to the scene of danger. His presence encouraged his men; succours arrived; and the English, after an obstinate resistance, were repulsed.²

¹ Pict. 128—131. Orderic, 179.

² Pict. 132—134. Orderic, 182—185. Hunt. 211. Malin. 57.

Thus ended this memorable and fatal battle. On the side of the victors almost sixty thousand men had been engaged, and more than one-fourth were left on the field. The number of the vanquished, and the amount of their loss, are unknown. By the vanity of the Norman historians the English army has been exaggerated beyond the limits of credibility; by that of the native writers it has been reduced to a handful of resolute warriors;¹ but both agree that with Harold and his brothers perished all the nobility of the south of England; a loss which could not be repaired. The king's mother begged as a boon the dead body of her son; and offered as a ransom its weight in gold;² but the resentment of William had rendered him callous to pity, and insensible to all interested considerations. He ordered the corpse of the fallen monarch to be buried on the beach; adding with a sneer: "He guarded the coast while he was alive; let him continue to guard it after death." By stealth, however, or by purchase, the royal remains were removed from this unhallowed site, and deposited in the church of Waltham, which Harold had founded before he ascended the throne.³

CHAPTER VII.

ANGLO-SAXONS.—1066.

POLITY OF THE ANGLO-SAXONS.—FEUDAL CUSTOMS.—RANKS IN SOCIETY.—COURTS OF LAW.—CRIMES.—SLAVES.

EVERY account of the civil polity of the Anglo-Saxons must necessarily be imperfect. We can only view the subject through the intervening gloom of eight centuries; and the faint light which is furnished by imperfect notices, scattered hints, and partial descriptions, may serve to irritate, but not to satisfy curiosity. It would be in vain to seek for information in the works of foreign writers; and the native historians never imagined that it could be requisite to delineate institutions with which they had been familiarized from their childhood, and which they

¹ See Pict. 128; Orderic, 178; and in opposition, Ingulf, 69; Chron. Sax. 172; Flor. 634; Malm. 53.

² Baron Maseres has calculated the average weight of the human body at somewhat less than 11,000 guineas.—Pict. 138, note.

³ Pictaviensis (135), and Orderic (185), say that he was buried on the beach; most of our historians (Malm. 57; West. 224; Paris, 3), that the body was given to his mother without ransom, and interred by her orders at Waltham. A more romantic story is told by the author of the Waltham MS. in the Cotton Library, Jul. D. 6, who wrote about a century afterwards. If we may believe him, two of the canons, Osgod Cnoppe, and Ailric, the child's maister, were sent to be spectators of the battle. They obtained from William, to whom they presented ten marks of gold, permission to search for the body of their benefactor. Unable to distinguish it among the heaps of the slain, they sent for Harold's mistress, Editha, surnamed "The Fair," and the "Swan's Neck." By her his features were recognised. The corpse was interred at Waltham with regal honours, in the presence of several Norman earls and gentlemen. Mr. Turner first called the attention of his readers to this MS. Hist. of Eng. i. 60.

naturally judged would be perpetuated along with their posterity.

Of the military character and predatory spirit of the Saxons an accurate notion may be formed from the Danish adventurers of the ninth and tenth centuries. Both were scions from the same Gothic stock; but the latter retained for a longer period the native properties of the original plant. Hengist and Cerdic, and their fellow-chieftains, were the sea-kings of their age, animated with the same spirit, and pursuing the same objects as the barbarians, whose ferocity yielded to the perseverance of Alfred, but subdued the pusillanimity of Ethelred. The reader has only to transfer to the Saxons the Danish system of warfare, its multiplied aggressions, its unquenchable thirst of plunder, and its unprovoked and wanton cruelties, and he will form a correct picture of the state of Britain, from the first defection of Hengist to the final establishment of the octarchy. The adventurers did not think of colonizing the countries which they conquered, till they had become weary of devastation; and then they introduced the institutions to which they had been habituated in their original settlements, and successively modified them as circumstances suggested.

Of these the most important, and that which formed the groundwork of the rest, may be discovered among the Germans in the age of Tacitus. From him we learn that every chieftain was surrounded by a number of retainers, who did him honour in time of peace, and accompanied him to the field in time of war. To fight by his side they deemed an indispensable duty; to survive his fall, an indelible disgrace.¹ It was this artificial connection, this principle which reciprocally bound the lord to his vassal, and the vassal to his lord, that held together the northern hordes, when they issued forth in quest of adventures. They retained it in their new homes; and its consequences were gradually developed, as each tribe made successive advances in power and civilization. Hence, in process of time, and by gradual improvements, grew up the feudal system, with its long train of obligations, of homage, suit, service, purveyance, reliefs, wardships, and scutage. That it was introduced into England by the Norman conqueror, is the opinion of respectable writers; and the assertion may be true, if they speak of it only in its mature and most oppressive form. But all the primary germs of the feudal services may be described among the Saxons, even in the earlier periods of their government; and many of them flourished in full luxuriance long before the extinction of the dynasty. As the subject is interesting, I may be allowed to treat it more in detail.

That the artificial relation between the lord and his man, or vassal, was accurately understood, and that its duties were faithfully performed by the Anglo-Saxons, is sufficiently evident from numerous instances in their history. We have seen² that when Cynewulf was surprised in the dead of the night at Merton, his men refused to abandon, or even to survive their lord; and when on the next morning the eighty-four followers of Cyneheard were surrounded by a superior force, they also spurned the offer of life and liberty, and chose rather to yield up their breath in a hopeless contest, than to violate the fealty which they had sworn to a murderer and an outlaw.³ An attachment of this romantic and generous kind cannot but excite our sympathy. It grew out of the doctrine, that of all the ties which nature has formed or society invented, the most sacred was that which bound the lord and the vassal; whence it was inferred that the breach of so solemn an engagement was a crime of the most disgraceful and unpardonable atrocity. By Alfred it was declared inexpiable; the laws pronounced against the offender the sentence of forfeiture and death.¹

¹ Tac. Germ. 13, 14. ² See History, p. 89.

³ Chron. Sax. anno 750, p. 57.

It was not, however, an institution which provided solely for the advantage of one party. The obligations were reciprocal. The vassal shared with his fellows in the favours of his lord, and lived in security under his protection. It was a contract, cemented by oath, for the benefit of each. "By the lord," said the inferior, placing his hands between those of his chief, "I promise to be faithful and true; to love all that thou lovest, and shun all that thou shunest, conformably to the laws of God and man; and never in will or weald (power), in word or work, to do that which thou loathest, provided thou hold me as I mean to serve, and fulfil the conditions to which we agreed when I subjected myself to thee, and chose thy will."²

This last proviso furnished the usual pretext for the dissolution of these engagements. To it every powerful chieftain appealed as often as he dared to disobey the orders of his sovereign, the "king-lord," as he was called, in contradistinction to inferior lords. The sub-vassal, indeed, could not be compelled by the tenour of his oath to bear arms against the head of the state; but he never presumed to doubt the rectitude of his immediate chief, and always accompanied him to the field, whether it were against the enemies, or the sovereign of his country. We are told that Godwin and his sons were "loth to march against their king-lord;" yet their "men" followed them in sufficient numbers to render doubtful the issue of the contest; and on the submission of their leaders were only required to transfer their homage to "the hands" of the king.

It should, however, be observed, that the Anglo-Saxon vassals were divided into two classes. Some were vassals by tenure, holding lands under the obligation of following their lord; and these appear to have been numerous; for many of the sons of the noble Saxon had no other inheritance but their swords, and no other profession but that of arms. These were therefore always ready to accept the offer of lands in return for military service; and were accustomed, if they met with no such offer in their native province, to seek employment among the retainers of some powerful chieftain in the other Saxon kingdoms.³ Besides these there were also vassals from choice, men who, possessing lands of their own, enjoyed the enviable privilege of choosing their own lords; for it was a maxim of Anglo-Saxon legislation that every man should have a superior answerable for his conduct.⁴ Of both descriptions several notices may be discovered mentioned in the early laws of the southern kingdoms.—Leg. 10, 22, 23, 25.

¹ Chron. Sax. 69. Leg. Sax. p. 33, 34, 35, 142, 143. Even the word vassal seems to have been known in England as early as the reign of Alfred. Asser, his instructor, calls the thanes of Somerset, nobiles vassalli Sumertunensis plagæ.—Asser, 33.

² Leg. 401, 50, 63. Brompt. 859.

³ See Bede's remarks on the filii nobilium vel emeritorum militum.—Ep. ad Egb. Ant. 309. These I take to be the sithcundmen, or men of the sith or military profession, so often

⁴ In Latin they were called commendati. They were common in France (Baluz. Capit. 443, 536), and seem to have been very numerous in England. Thus, when Alfred bequeaths several of his lands to his son Edward, "he prays the families at Cheddar, in Somersetshire, to choose Edward on the same terms as had formerly been agreed between Alfred and them."—Test. Ælf. We among the relics of Anglo-Saxon antiquity.

Of the manner in which the original adventurers divided among themselves the lands of the natives, we can speak from conjecture only; we must wait for the introduction of Christianity before we meet with more certain and written documents. Then, it appears that every district in possession of the Saxons had been parcelled out, by measurement or estimation, into folc-lands or family-lands,¹ each allotment being supposed capable of supporting the settler, his family, labourers, herds, and flocks. Thus we learn from Eddius and Beda that the Isle of Wight comprised twelve hundred folc-lands, the kingdom of Sussex seven thousand, the kingdom of Mercia, north and south of the Trent, twelve thousand.² These folc-lands were divided into estates of inheritance, and loans or benefices. The first were estates in perpetuity, transmissible by descent or will, or sale or gift; and were now called boclands, because they were conveyed by bocs or writings, and subject to the conditions expressed in such writings; the others formed a general or national fund, and were allotted as benefices in return for courtly or military services; of course the tenure of such lands was only temporary; they reverted to the original stock on the death, removal, or resignation of the holder. The king, however, could, with the consent of the witan, lawfully convey by charter to a favoured individual any number of folc-lands as an estate of inheritance. In that case the land was said to be booked to him.

often find them described in Domesday as free men, who could go with their lands to whomsoever they pleased. Thus, in Kent, "poterant ire quolibet cum terris suis Lefstan et Lewin et Eluret et Siret et duo alii tempore regis Edwardi."—Domes. 10, 6, 2. In the Exon survey, for the expression "ire quod volebant," is substituted "eligere dominum secundum voluntatem suam."—Fol. 383.

At first a broad distinction was drawn between lands booked to the clergy or mass-thanes, and lands booked to the laity or woneld-thanes. As the former were appointed to the service of God, it was their duty to be employed in offices of charity and devotion: they were consequently forbidden to mingle in the fray of arms, or to shed the blood of their fellow-men. Hence their lands were exonerated from all secular services; an exemption so valuable that many noblemen purchased it of the king under the pretence of establishing monasteries on their estates. This abuse became so prevalent in Northumbria, that Beda in 730 openly proclaimed his fear that in a short time the country would be left without defence against a foreign enemy; for the sons of the thanes and gesiths were obliged to offer their services to foreign princes, because there remained few lands for their maintenance at home.³

What effect this remonstrance produced we know not; but we find very shortly afterwards the kings of Mercia and Wessex declaring that there are three things from which no boc-land can be exempted, the faesten-geweorc or reparation of fortresses, the bryggeweorc or construction of bridges, and the fyrd-færeld or military and naval service.⁴ But about a century later Ethelwulf granted a partial indulgence by enfranchising entirely a tenth part of the boclands belonging not only to the Church but also to the laity.⁵

But these three were not the only burthens to which boc-lands were subject. Unless exemptions were

¹ Terræ familiarum.—Bed. passim.

² Edd. c. 40. Bed. iii. 24; iv. 13, 16, 19; v. 19.

³ Bed. Op. Min. ii. 217, 218.

⁴ Cod. Dipl. i. 120, 204, 243.

⁵ Ministriis nostris.—Cod. Dip. ii. 51, 52. Laicis miseris (an error for ministris).—Ibid. ii. 56. Malm. i. 170.

granted by the charters, these lands were still bound to render many of the same services which they rendered as folc-lands. From the tenour of several enfranchisements, it appears that such services were payments in kind to the king out of the produce of the land and waters; contributions of provisions for the royal household when the king chanced to be in the neighbourhood, or at certain specified times in the course of the year; the obligation of supplying board, lodgings, and carriages for his officers, and for messengers either to him or from him; of maintaining his horses, hounds, and hawks, and also their keepers; of furnishing timber and workmen towards the repair or rebuilding of his villa, and of granting a livelihood to persons demanding it under his warrant, besides the payments of yearly gutfols and rents, and of bots or compensations arising out of the fines levied on offenders.¹ These appear to have been exacted according to the custom of the district; and not by the king only, but also in a limited degree by the ealdorman of the district, who in case of enfranchisement often received a pecuniary compensation for his consent.²

In what manner military service for lands was originally regulated, it is impossible to discover; at a later period it was fixed on the basis of immemorial usage, which appears from Domesday to have varied in almost every county and borough. Perhaps we shall not recede far from the truth, if we judge of the rest of the kingdom from Berkshire, in which we learn that one miles was furnished for every five hides of land; that he served during two months; and that, if his own possessions did not amount to the legal quantity, he received pay at the rate of four shillings to the hide from the other proprietors. It may be observed that the same number of hides was required by the law for the dignity of thane, who by the Norman compilers of Domesday is called, in their feudal language, miles regis dominicus.

The performance of these services was enforced by numerous enactments in the laws of the Saxon kings, from the time of Ina (700) to the reign of Canute (1030). On some occasions the defaulter was punished with the forfeiture of his lands, on others with the payment of a stated fine. In Worcestershire, if he were a vassal by choice, his real property was placed at the mercy of the king; if the tenant of another, his lord was bound to find a substitute, or pay a fine of forty shillings, with power to levy the expense on the defaulter. The burghers of Oxford were at liberty to send twenty soldiers, or to pay twenty pounds; at Warwick whoever disobeyed the summons, was mulcted one hundred shillings; in Colchester every house paid sixpence in lieu of all military service. In these and numerous other instances of a similar description, we may easily recognise the rudiments of the pre-station, called scutage by the Norman feudalists.³

The king appears to have claimed the power, not only of disposing of the benefice or fee after the death of the tenant, but also of controlling the distribution of his other possessions. Hence the vassal in his will was always anxious to obtain the confirmation of his superior, and to make provision for the payment of what was termed in the Saxon laws the heriot, in the Norman the relief.⁴

¹ See Cod. Dipl. i. 120, 204, 254, 270, 272, 313; ii. 30, 60.

² Ibid. i. 315; ii. 31, 411.

³ Leg. 23, 135. Domesday, passim.

⁴ Though Bracton makes a distinction between them, the laws more ancient than Bracton make none. (Compare Leg. Sax. 144 with 223.) By the Conqueror it was

Of both these practices we meet with numerous instances. Thus Elfhelm, after leaving his heriot to the king, concludes his will in these words: "And now I beseech thee, my beloved lord, that my last testament may stand, and that thou do not permit it to be annulled. God is my witness that I was always obedient to thy father, faithful to him, both in mind and might, and ever true and loving to thee."¹ So also Archbishop Ælfric first "bequeaths to his lord his best ship, and the sail-yards thereto, and sixty helmets, sixty coats of mail," and then wills, if it were his lord's will, &c.² By the laws it was provided that the heriot should be paid within twelve months from the death of the last possessor; and was apportioned to the rank which he bore in the state. That of an earl was four horses saddled, four unsaddled, four helmets, four coats of mail, eight spears, eight shields, four swords, and one hundred mancuses of gold; of a king's thane one-half of the last; of an inferior thane his horse, and his arms, with an offer of his hounds or hawks. If he died intestate, the payment of the heriot preserved the estate in his family; if he fell in battle for his lord, the heriot was remitted.³

decreed that the relief should be paid out of the chattels of the deceased. The relief of the vavisor is the best horse which the tenant had on the day of his death; a jour de sa mort.—Ibid.

¹ Lye, App. ii.

² More's Ælfric, 62. Yet as passages of this kind are not general in wills, I am inclined to think that they were nothing more than petitions for the king's protection, if any attempt were made to set the will aside. Æthelstan, indeed, asked and obtained the consent of King Æthelred that he might dispose by will of his property: but he was the king's son, and that very circumstance may take his case out of the general rule. Yet even he, after this consent, prefers a petition to the witan "for their aid that his will may stand."—Lye, App. No. 6.

³ Leg. 144, 223, 245. It has been said that heriots were introduced by Canute, because they were not mentioned in the laws of his predecessors. But he seems

There is reason to believe that the Saxon, like the Norman kings (and their example was probably imitated by the inferior lords), claimed occasionally the wardship of heiresses, and disposed of them in marriage.⁴ The laws, though their language is not sufficiently explicit, seem to allude to such a custom. They provide that no maid or widow shall be compelled to marry against her will, and very inconsistently forbid the female to be sold in marriage, while they allow a present to be accepted from her husband.⁵ This custom prevailed also in the royal burghs. In Shrewsbury no woman could marry without a license from the king. With her first husband she paid a fine of ten shillings; if she took a second, the sum was doubled.⁶

From the tenures of land we may pass to the distinction of ranks, and the administration of justice. With a few shades of accidental difference, both these were substantially the same in all the nations of Gothic origin. Among the Anglo-Saxons the free population was divided into the eorl and ceorl, the men of noble and ignoble descent.⁷ The former were said to be ethel-born; and with a people acknowledging no other merit than merely to record an ancient custom. They are noticed as such under Edgar (Hist. Elen. 480), and Elfhelm, whose heriot has been already mentioned, lived many years before Æthelred (longo retroacto tempore).—Ibid. 498. Edgar himself describes them as an ancient institution in the charter, in which he frees the monasteries from the obligation. "Solitus census, quem indigenæ Heriotus usualiter vocitant, qui pro hujus patriæ potentibus post obitum regibus dari solet."—Seldeni, Spicileg. ad Eadm. p. 183.

⁴ Leg. 144, 145. Hist. Rames. 403, 441.
⁵ Leg. 109, 122, 144, 145.
⁶ Domesday, Scitropescire, and a forfeiture is mentioned in Norfolk, because the woman who held the property married within a year after the death of her husband.—General Introduction, vol. iii., by Mr. Ellis.

⁷ By not attending to this meaning of the word eorl, and rendering it earl, the translators of the Saxon laws have made several passages unintelligible.—See Leg. 3, 35, 66.

martial prowess, it is probable that this distinction attached to those only whose fathers had never exercised the occupations of husbandry or of the mechanical arts. It was merely personal; it conferred neither property nor power, but it served to gratify pride; and numerous complaints attest the arrogance with which the noble Saxon looked down on his inferior, and the reluctance with which the "full-born" bore the superiority of the "less-born," whom merit or favour had raised above them.¹ The termination ing added to the name of the progenitor designated his posterity. The Uffingas were the descendants of Uffa, the Oiscingas the descendants of Oisc.² But the more lofty title of etheling, the son of the noble, was reserved for the members of the reigning family; and these in each of the Saxon dynasties, excepting perhaps that of Sussex, pretended to derive their pedigree from Woden, a real or fabulous conqueror, who was adored by his votaries as the god of battles. The supposed divinity of their parent secured to them the veneration of their pagan followers; and when Christianity had dissipated the illusion, the superiority of their earthly descent was still acknowledged by all their contemporaries.³

Among the ethel-born the first place was occupied by the cyning or king.⁴ In the succession to the crown the reader must have observed occasional deviations from the direct line of hereditary descent. The causes have been already explained; but whether the new monarch were the immediate or the collateral heir of his predecessor, the consent of the witan always preceded his coronation. Hence the original writers, whose language is the best evidence of the sentiments prevailing among their contemporaries, usually speak of their kings as elected to the throne. The cyning was the lord of the principal chieftains, and through them of their respective vassals. As his estates were nearly equal to theirs all together, so was his annual revenue and the number of his thanes; forming in the aggregate a power sufficient to humble the proudest, or to reduce the most factious of his subjects. Thrice in the year the great tenants of the crown were reminded of their dependence. At the festivals of Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide they were summoned to pay him their homage. They appeared before him in the guise of dependants, while he was seated on his throne with the crown on his head, and a sceptre in each hand. During eight days they were feasted at his expense, and on their dismissal received presents from his bounty.⁵ He exercised an undisputed authority over the national forces by sea and land. He was the supreme judge; and was accustomed to receive appeals from every court of judicature. Of the fines which were levied on offenders, the principal portion was paid into his treasury; he could commute the punishment of death, and was accustomed to liberate a prisoner in every burgh and jurisdiction into which he entered.⁶ His "peace" or protection secured the man to whom it was granted from the pursuit of his enemies. At his coronation, and for eight days afterwards, it was extended to the whole kingdom; each year it was

¹ Leg. 63, 111. Bed. 296.

² Bed. ii. 5, 15.

³ Chron. Sax. 13, 15. Gale, iii. 134. Voden, de cujus stirpe multarum provinciarum regum genus originem duxit.—Bed. i. 15.

⁴ The etymology of this word has been much disputed. As from thiuda, people, the Teutones formed thiudans, the chief of the people, I see no reason why from cynn, or kun, a race, might not be formed cyning, the chief of the race.

⁵ Chron. Sax. 163. Hist. Ram. 395. Scepteris simul et coronâ.—Ailred, Riv. 398. Regalia instrumenta sustinuit.—Id. 399.

⁶ Leg. 20, 65, 109, 201. Chron. Sax. 49. Asser, 70.

equally observed during the octaves of the three great festivals, in which he was accustomed to hold his court; and at all times it was enjoyed by every person within the circuit of four miles from his actual residence, by travellers on the four highways, and by merchants or their servants, as long as they were employed on the navigable rivers. Some infractions of this peace subjected the offender to a heavy amercement; others of a more heinous description placed his life and property at the mercy of the king.¹

Though there is no direct proof that any lands were appropriated to the crown, yet it can hardly be doubted; for the king always appears as the greatest landholder in the kingdom. Thus, taking the county of Kent as a sample, we find from Domesday that, out of four hundred and thirty places described as lying within its precincts, not fewer than one hundred and ninety-four, nearly one-half, belonged to Edward the Confessor; and that the remainder was unequally divided among the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishop of Rochester, the two abbots of St. Austin's and St. Martin's, the queen Editha, the earls Godwin, Harold, and Lewin, Alnod child, Brixi child, and Sbern Biga. These eleven were the great tenants in chief, the king's principal thanes, the real peers of the county. But besides the property and privileges, which they claimed in that capacity, most of them were in possession of parcels of land which they held in common with many inferior thanes, as sub-tenants, some under the crown, some under its immediate vassals, thus pointing out by the difference of their tenures, what originally was the king's demesne, and what was the demesne of the great lords in whose places they now stood.²

The consort of the cyning was originally known by the appellation of "queen," and shared in common with her husband the splendour of royalty. But of this distinction she was deprived by the crime of Eadburga, the daughter of Offa, who had administered poison to her husband Brihtric, king of Wessex. In the paroxysm of their indignation the witan punished the unoffending wives of their future monarchs by abolishing with the title of queen all the appendages of female royalty. Ethelwulf, in his old age, ventured to despise the prejudices of his subjects. His young consort, Judith, was crowned in France, and was permitted to seat herself by his side on the throne.³ But there is no satisfactory proof of any such coronation after Judith; and, though the title of the hour of nine on Saturday to the dawn of light on the Monday morning.—Leg. 103, 109, 121, 197. In France it began every week on the evening of the Wednesday, and lasted till the Monday.—Glaber, apud Du Cange, in voce Treva. During these days it was forbidden, under severe penalties, for any man to slay, maim, or assault his enemy, or to distrain or plunder his lands. Ut nullus homo alium assaliat, aut vulneret, aut occidat, nullus namium aut prædam capiat.—Order. Vit. anno 1096.

¹ Leg. 63, 199. The real distance to which the king's peace extended from his actual residence was whimsically fixed at three miles, three furlongs, three roods, nine feet, nine hands (inches?), and nine barley-corns.—Leg. 63. The object of this institution, as also of another called "the peace of God," was to diminish the number of outrages perpetrated under the pretext of retaliation. The latter is said to have been first established in Aquitain, about the year 1032; though its rudiments appear in the decrees of several councils before the close of the tenth century (Bouquet, x. 49, 147); and it is enforced in the laws of King Ethelred at the beginning of the eleventh (Leg. 103, 109). In England it included the Ember days, Advent, Lent, the vigils, and festivals of Christ, the Virgin Mary, the Apostles, and of All Saints, and every Sunday, reckoning from

² See Henshall's Summary Table of Lands in Kent, compiled from the autograph of Domesday. It is observable, that the Conqueror, when he distributed the county among his followers, still kept up the same number of eleven tenants in chief.—Ibid. p. 20.

³ Asser, 10.

Regina is occasionally given to the king's wife by Latin writers, she is generally termed "the lady"¹ in Anglo-Saxon instruments.² But whatever were the legitimate honours of the queen, she could not be deprived of the influence which was naturally attached to her situation; and no one presumed to solicit a favour from the monarch without offering a present to his wife.³ From several passages it appears that separate estates were allotted for the support not only of the queen but also of her children, and the princes of the blood.

After the royal family the highest order in the state was that of the ealdormen or earls. From the nature of their office they were sometimes styled viceroys;⁴ by Bede they are dignified with the titles of princes and satraps.⁵ The districts which they governed in the name of the king were denominated their shires, confined originally to a small tract of country, but gradually enlarged to the extent of our present counties. The policy of the West-Saxon kings, after the subjugation of the neighbouring states, still added to their authority by comprising several shires within the same earldom. Thus the whole kingdom of Mercia was intrusted by Alfred to the administration of the ealdorman Æthered;⁶ that of Northumbria by Edgar to the fidelity of the earl Osulf.⁷ It was the duty of the ealdorman, as the representative of the monarch, to lead the men of his shire to battle; to preside with the bishop in the courts of the county; and to enforce the execution of justice.⁸ Of the fines and rents paid to the king within his jurisdiction he appears to have received one-third.⁹ This office was originally in the gift of the crown, and might be forfeited by misconduct: but it was so frequently continued in the same family, that at last, instead of being solicited as a favour, it began to be claimed as a right.¹⁰ At the accession of Canute, the word jarl (or earl) was substituted for ealdorman; perhaps, because among the Danes the latter appellation was common to all those who were called the king's thanes, or greater thanes by the Anglo-Saxons.¹¹

In the more ancient writers we meet also with a class of men denominated the king's gesiths in their own language, and his comites or socii in the Latin documents. By Bede the comites are always distinguished from the milites, and by King Alfred, the translator of Bede, the first are termed gesiths, the others thanes. Many of these gesiths were of the first families in the nation:¹² and it would appear from their

¹ Chron. Sax. 132, 164, 165, 168. A letter in More's Ælfric begins thus: "Wulstan archbishop greets Canute king his lord, and Ælfric the lady."—p. 104. She gives herself the same title. "I, Ælfric, the lady, King Edward's mother."—Ibid. 98. In one charter Edgar's queen designates herself by the singular expression, ego Alfhryth præfati regis conslaterana.—Bede. App. 777.

² I am aware of the passage in the Laud MS. of the Chronicle (anno 1048) respecting the wife of Edward the Confessor, but do not think it conclusive.

³ Gale, iii. 457. Hickes, Dissert. 51.

⁴ Subregali.—Bede. App. 785—787.

⁵ Principes, Satrapæ, Primates, Optimates, Duces. All these titles are rendered by Alfred ealdormen.

⁶ Asser, 50, 52.

⁷ Mailros, 148.

⁸ Chron. Sax. 78. Leg. 73, 136.

⁹ Domesday, Hunteðunsceire, Snoting-hamsceire.

¹⁰ Chron. Sax. 169, 170.

¹¹ Canute tells us (see Constitut. de Foresta, Thorpe, i. 426) that the greater thanes were called ealdormen, the lesser youngmen;—juniores in the charters.

¹² Bede (iii. 22) mentions two gesiths as kinsmen of the prince. Kent was governed by Eghalch the gesith.—Text. Roff. 76. Æthelric calls himself subregulus et comes gloriosissimi regis Æthelbaldi (Bede, App. 754), and is called by Æthelbald, reverentissimus comes meus, mihi que satis carus, filius quondam Huiciorum regis osheres.—Cod. Dipl. i. 100.

appellation, that they were bound to wait on the king in his court, or to accompany him in his journeys.¹ We meet with no mention of them after the reign of Alfred.

We also meet with the titles of "heretoch" and "hold," denoting military commands of importance: and of "child," which has been conceived to mean the principalthane of a particular district. But the real rank and powers of these officers have not been satisfactorily ascertained.²

The thanes, so called from theg-nian, to serve, were a numerous and distinguished order of men, divided into several classes of different rank, and with different privileges. We read of greater and lesser thanes, of the thanes of the king, and the thanes of ealdormen and prelates. The heriot of the higher was fourfold that of the lower thane: and while the former acknowledged no other superior than the king, the latter owed suit to the court of his immediate lord.³ It is certain that they held their lands by the honourable tenure of service about the person of their lord or in the field. Milites is the term by which they are usually designated in the Norman writers, and every expression in Bede denoting a military character is invariably rendered thane by his royal translator.⁴ The law required one combatant from every five hides of land; and the acquisition of property to the same extent was sufficient to raise the ceorl to the rank of a thane.⁵ But without it, though he might accompany the king to the field, though he should possess a helmet, a coat of mail, and a golden-hilted sword, he was still condemned to remain in the subordinate and humble condition of a ceorl. A politic exception was admitted in favour of the merchants, who were accustomed to form companies or guilds, and possessed their lands in common. To sail thrice to a foreign land with a cargo of his own wares, entitled the merchant to the rank and privileges of the thaneship.⁶ Of these privileges the most valuable was the amount of the were, an advantage which will be more fully explained hereafter.

The gerefas or reeves were officers of high importance, appointed by the king and the great proprietors in their respective demesnes. They were to be found in every separate jurisdiction; but the principal were the reeves of the shires, ports, and boroughs. It was their duty to collect the tolls, to apprehend malefactors, to require sureties, to receive the rents, and on several occasions to act in the place of their lords.⁷ They were assessors, sometimes the chief judges in different courts, and were commanded under a severe penalty to regulate their decisions by the directions of the doom-book.⁸

¹ Sith, a journey, or expedition.

² We read of Wulfnoth, who was the father of Earl Godwin, and child of Sussex (Chron. Sax. 137), of Edric child in Herefordshire (Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1067), Alfric child in East Anglia (Hist. Elien. 470), Alnod child in Kent, Brixi child in Kent (Domesday, Chenth). I suspect the appellation merely denotes a person, who from his childhood was heir apparent to some high office. It was given to Edwy before his accession to the crown (Lye, App. iv.), and to Edgar Atheling, who, as he never became king, retained it during the whole reign of William the Conqueror.—Chron.

Sax. 173, 182. Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1068, 1075. It was something like the present Spanish title of "Infant."

³ Leg. 47, 118, 144. Domes. Worcest. 172.

⁴ Bed. iii. 14; iv. 13; v. 13.

⁵ Leg. 70.

⁶ Leg. 71. These regulations have been attributed to Athelstan, but the text describes them as the ancient customs of the nation. It is to them that we are to attribute the title of barons given to the merchants of London and the Cinque Ports.

⁷ Leg. 9, 12, 48, 69.

⁸ Leg. 48.

The foregoing were ethel-born: the unethel, the tradesmen, mechanics, husbandmen, and labourers, were comprehended under the generic denomination of ceorls. Of these there were two classes. The superior class consisted of socmen, or free ceorls, who held lands by conventional services, or chose their own lords, or possessed the right of disposing of their real estates by sale, or will, or donation. The others were attached to the soil, as part and parcel of the manor, transferable with it from one lord to another, bound to give their personal labour in return for the land which they cultivated for their own use, and liable to be punished as run-aways if they withdrew out of the manorial jurisdiction under which they were born.¹ They had indeed certain rights recognised by the law; and could not in many places be dispossessed, as long as they performed their customary services: but then these services were often uncertain in amount, depending on the will of the lord; he could tallage or tax them at discretion; he exacted from them the mercheta or gersume, a fine for the marriage of their daughters and sisters, and did not permit them to sell their cattle out of the manor, till they had purchased the permission in his court. Traces of all these customs may be found in the remains of Anglo-Saxon antiquity, and their previous existence is proved by the decisions in the courts of law during the Norman period, when exemption from these servile burthens was admitted as incontrovertible evidence of free tenancy.²

Among a people but lately emerged from barbarism, the administration of justice is always rude and simple: and though the absence of legal forms and pleading may casually insure a prompt and equitable decision, it is difficult without their aid to oppose the arts of intrigue and falsehood, or the influence of passion and prejudice. The proceedings before the Anglo-Saxon tribunals would not have suited a more advanced state of civilization: they were ill calculated to elicit truth, or to produce conviction: and in many instances which have been recorded by contemporary writers, our more correct or more artificial notions will be shocked at the credulity or the precipitancy of the judges. The subject, however, is curious and interesting. These ancient courts still exist under different names; and the intelligent observer may discover in their proceedings the origin of several institutions, which now mark the administration of justice in the English tribunals.

The lowest species of jurisdiction known among the Anglo-Saxons was that of "Sac and Soc," words, the derivation of which has puzzled the ingenuity of antiquaries, though the

¹ In the Bolden Book may be seen innumerable instances of the difference between the rent and services of these two classes. Both paid partly in kind, partly in money, and partly in labour: but the free tenant worked only a fixed number of days for the lord in seed-time and during the harvest; the other worked in addition three days in the week during the whole year, with the exception of a fortnight at Christmas, and a week at the festivals of Easter and Whitsuntide. The services of mechanics were regulated in the same manner.

² See Abbrev. Placit. 57. Norf. Rot. 1, 2—95. North. Rot. 1—147. Suth. Rot. 9—161. Leyces. Rot. 6, et passim. We meet also with cotsets, coterells, cotmen, or cottagers (qui cotagia et curtilegia tenent.—Stat. i. 243), who, as their holdings were small, rendered a smaller portion of labour, that is, in the Bolden Book, two days in the week from Lammas to Martinmas, and one only during the rest of the year. There were also bordars, whose services were few, but multum servilia.—Abb. Plac. 211. Kent. Rot. 19. Bonds appear to have been the masters of families among the second class of ceorls. If a sufficient number of free tenants could not be procured to form a jury, the deficiency was supplied from among the most discreet and lawful bonds.—Stat. i. 207.

meaning is sufficiently understood. It was the privilege of holding pleas and imposing fines within a certain district, and with a few variations was perpetuated in the manorial courts of the Norman dynasty. It seems to have been claimed and exercised by all the greater and by several of the lesser thanes: but was differently modified by the terms of the original grant, or by immemorial usage. Some took cognizance of all crimes committed within their soke; the jurisdiction of others was confined to offences of a particular description; some might summon every delinquent, whether native or stranger, before their tribunal; while others could inflict punishment on none but their own tenants. From the custom of holding these courts in the hall of the lord, they were usually termed the hall-motes.¹

Superior to the hall-mote was the mote of the hundred, a large division of the county. It was assembled every month under the presidency of the caldormen or chief officer of the hundred, accompanied by the principal clergymen, freeholders, and the reeve and four men as representatives from each township. Once in the year was convened an extraordinary meeting, when every male above the age of twelve was compelled to attend; the state of the guilds and tythings (or associations of ten families) was ascertained; and no man was permitted to remain at large who could not provide a surety for his peaceable demeanour. In these courts offenders were tried, and civil causes decided. But their utility was not confined to their judicial proceedings. In a period when few possessed the humble acquirements of reading and writing, the stability of pecuniary transactions was principally dependent on the honesty and character of the witnesses; and the testimony of the hundred was deemed on that account conclusive in questions of litigated right or disputed obligation. Hence men frequented these meetings in the course of private business; and contracts were made, exchanges ratified, purchases completed, and moneys paid, in the presence of the court. But sometimes, when interests of greater importance were at stake, or the parties belonged to different districts, the authority of a single hundred was thought insufficient. On such occasions, that the controversy might be brought before a more numerous and less partial tribunal, the caldorman convoked an assembly of the contiguous hundreds, or of the third part of the county. The former was termed the court of the lathe, and the latter of the trything.²

Of still higher dignity and more extensive jurisdiction was the shire-mote, or court of the county. It was held twice in the year, in the beginning of May and October. Every great proprietor was compelled to attend, either in person or by his steward, or to send in his place his chaplain, bailiff, and four principal tenants. The bishop and caldorman, or earl, presided with equal authority, and their assessors were the sheriff and the most noble of the royal thanes. In their proceedings they began with those causes which related to the dues and immunities of the church; passed to the fines and forfeitures belonging to the crown; and ended with the controversies of individuals. In the last case it was the duty of the court to attempt a reconciliation by proposing a compromise; or, if the proposal were rejected, to pronounce a definitive judgment.¹ It was also on these occasions that the laws were recited, which had been enacted in the great council of the nation. We have still extant a letter to King Ethelstan from the members of a county court, the bishops, the thanes, and the men of Kent, who recapitulate the laws which he had notified to them, promise obedience, and conclude with the most forcible expressions of attachment to his person.²

¹ Leg. 241, 242, 256. Hist. Elfen. 490, 501. Domesday, passim. These courts absorbed much of the business, which would otherwise have been carried before the courts of the hundred and county; and from them are derived our present courts baron, with civil, and courts leet with criminal jurisdiction.

² Leg. 50, 60, 78, 117, 203, 204, 205, 240. Hist. Elfen. 473, 475, 484. The lathes still exist in some of the southern counties, where the hundreds were small. From the trything is supposed to be derived the local denomination of riding, the third part of a county. In burghs were held burghmotes, corresponding with the motes of the hundred.—Leg. Sax. 78.

That the shires and hundreds, with their respective courts, were originally established by the policy of Alfred, is asserted by a well-informed writer, who lived at the time of the Norman conquest.³ There is, however, reason to doubt much, if not the whole, of his statement. Alfred might improve, but he certainly could not invent, a system which existed some centuries before his reign. 1. The division of shires was common to all the northern nations:⁴ some are known to have existed in England under their present names since the first settlement of the Saxons;⁵ and others are mentioned in the laws and by the writers prior to the supposed division by Alfred.⁶ The great inequality in their measurement, and the great irregularity in their distribution, prove that they were not the uniform work of one monarch: but that they owe their origin to different princes, who divided the country as necessity might require, or policy might suggest. 2. The hundreds also appear to have been a continental institution. From Tacitus we learn that the Germans of his age divided their territories into pagi; that each pagus furnished a band of one hundred combatants for battle: and that each band was termed "the hundred of the pagus" by which it was furnished.⁷ Whether in the establishment of hundreds the Saxons followed this or any other particular rule, is uncertain. It has been supposed that the name was given to the district occupied by a hundred families of freemen. This hypothesis has been generally admitted, because it satisfies the mind, and spares the trouble of ulterior investigation: but it will appear very questionable to those who have examined the notices in Domesday, and compared the disproportionate limits of even neighbouring hundreds.⁸

Ingulf has also attributed to Alfred the institution of tythings, which by

¹ Leg. 78, 204, 205, 240.

² Brompt. 950. Thorpe, i. 194. The decisions of the witan in civil causes were also sent to the shire-mote.—Hist. Elien. 499.

³ Ingulf, 28. He has been followed by Malmshury and others.

⁴ Baluze, Capit. i. 10, 39, 103.

⁵ Kent, Sussex, Essex.

⁶ Leg. 16, 20, 21. Chron. Sax. 56, 74, 75, 78. Asser, 3, 8, 14. Asser was the contemporary and instructor of the king. It is evident from his silence that he was ignorant of any new institution of shires or hundreds.

⁷ Tac. Germ. vi.

⁸ Hundredus continet centum villas.—Brompt. 958. It is plain from Bede that villa, which his translator always renders tune, comprehended not only the mansion of the proprietor, but also the cottages of his tenants and slaves. Whitaker maintains that ten of these townships formed a tything or manor, and ten manors a hundred.—Whit. Manchester, ii. 114—120. But it will be difficult to reconcile this opinion with the statements in Domesday. I will take for example the hundreds in the lathe of Sutton, in Kent. All the others are similar.

Hundreds. Sowings.		Acres of Manors.
	Meadow.
Greenwich ... 8½	131	9
Leenes ... 19½	52	4
Bromley ... 8	14	2
Rokesley ... 27½	78	14
Axtane ... 65½	476	36
Westerham ... 4½	16	2

the very name import either a subdivision of the hundred, or an association of ten neighbouring families. By law every freeman was to be enrolled in one of these associations, all the members of which were made perpetual bail for each other. If one of the number fled from justice, the remaining nine were allowed the respite of a month to discover the fugitive; when, if he were not forthcoming, the pecuniary penalty of his crime was levied on his goods, and, in case of deficiency, on the goods of the tything, unless it could be proved that its members had not connived at his escape.¹

From these local courts, the hall-mote, the hundred-mote, and the shire-mote, appeals were allowed to the superior authority of the monarch. Alfred was accustomed to inspect the minutes of their proceedings, to confirm or annul their decisions, and occasionally to punish the judges for their partiality or ignorance. By his office the king was the supreme magistrate in the state; but he had other duties to perform; and it was forbidden to bring any cause before him, till it had been previously submitted to the decision of the inferior judges. This prohibition was, however, frequently disregarded; and few princes refused to exercise their judicial functions, as often as they were solicited by a favourite, or tempted by a present. Whenever the king was present, a court might be speedily assembled. To the thanes and clergymen who attended on his person, he added the prelates and nobility of the neighbourhood, and with their assistance either pacified the parties, or pronounced a definitive judgment. But these occasional courts, respectable as they might be, were eclipsed by the superior splendour and dignity of the "mickle synoths or witenagemots," the great meetings, or assemblies of the counsellors, which were regularly convened at the festivals of Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, and occasionally at other times, as difficult circumstances or sudden exigencies might require. Who were the constituent members of this supreme tribunal, has long been a subject of debate; and the dissertations to which it has given rise have only contributed to involve it in greater obscurity. It has been pretended that not only the military tenants had a right to be present, but that the ceorls also attended by their representatives, the borsholders of the tythings. The latter part of the assertion has been made without a shadow of evidence, and the former is built on very fallacious grounds. It is indeed probable that, in the infancy of the Anglo-Saxon states, most of the military retainers may have attended the public councils; yet even then the deliberations were confined to the chieftains; and nothing remained for the vassals but to applaud the determination of their lords. But in later times, when the several principalities were united into one monarchy, the recurrence of these assemblies, thrice in every year within the short space of six months, would have been an insupportable burthen to the lesser proprietors; and there is reason to suspect that the greater attended only when it was required by the importance of events, or by the vicinity of the court. The principal members seem to have been the spiritual and temporal thanes, who held immediately of the crown, and who could command the services of military vassals. It was necessary that the king should obtain the assent of these to all legislative enactments; because without their acquiescence and support it was impossible to carry them into execution. To many charters we have the signatures of the witan. They seldom exceed thirty in number; they never amount to sixty. They include the names of the king and his sons, of a few bishops and abbots, of nearly an equal number of ealdormen and thanes, and occasionally of the queen, and of one or two abbesses.¹ Others, the fideles or vassals, who had accompanied their lords, are mentioned as looking on and applauding; but there exists no proof whatever that they enjoyed any share in the deliberations.²

¹ Leg. Sax. 136, 201, 202, 240.

The legal powers of this assembly have never been accurately ascertained; probably they were never fully defined. To them, on the vacancy of the crown, belonged the choice of the next sovereign; and we find them exercising this claim not only at the decease of each king, but even during the absence of Ethelred in Normandy. They compelled him to enter into a solemn compact with the nation, before they would acknowledge him a second time for king of England.³ In ordinary cases their deliberations were held in the presence of the sovereign; and, as individually they were his vassals, as they had sworn "to love what he loved, and shun what he shunned," there can be little doubt that they generally acquiesced in his wishes. In the preambles to the Saxon laws the king sometimes assumes a lofty strain.

He decrees: the witan give their advice. He denominates himself the sovereign; they are his bishops, his ealdormen, his thanes. But on other occasions this style of royalty disappears, and the legislative enactments are attributed to the witan in conjunction with the king.⁴ The same diversity appears in treaties concluded with foreign powers. Some bear only the name of the king; in others the witan are introduced as sanctioning the instrument by their concurrence.⁵ In their judicial capacity they compromised or decided civil controversies among themselves; summoned before them state criminals of great power and connections; and usually pronounced the sentence of forfeiture and outlawry against those whom they found guilty.⁶ As legislators they undertook to provide for the defence of the realm, the prevention and punishment of crimes, and the due administration of justice.⁷

In all these tribunals the judges were the free tenants, owing suit to the court, and afterwards called its peers. But the real authority seems to have resided in the president, and the principal of his assessors, whose opinion was generally echoed and applauded by the rest of the members.⁸ Their proceedings were simplified and

¹ See Ingulf, 32, 44, 45; Gale, iii. 517; Hemingford, passim. From a passage in the History of Ely (p. 513), it has been inferred that an estate of forty hides entitled its possessor to a seat in the witan.

² Præsentibus archiepiscopis, et episcopis Angliæ universis, nec non Beorredo rege Mercie, et Edmundo Estanglorum rege, abbatum et abbatissarum, ducum, comitum, procerumque totius terræ, aliorumque fidelium infinita multitudo, qui omnes regium chirographum laudaverunt, dignitates vero sua nomina subscripserunt.—Ing. 17.

³ Chron. Sax. 146.

⁴ Leg. 14, 34, 48, 78, 102, 113.

⁵ Leg. 47, 51, 104. Chron. Sax. 132.

⁶ Chron. Sax. 164, 184.

⁷ Ingulf, 10, 16. Chron. Sax. 126, 130, 165.

⁸ Qui liberas in eis terras habent, per quos debent causæ singulorum alterna prosecutione tractari.—Leg. Sax. 248. If the judges differ in opinion, the decision is in one law left with the majority, in another with those of highest rank. Si in judicio inter pares oriatur dissensio, vincat sententia plurimorum.—Ibid. 237. Vincat sententia meliorum.—Ibid. 248. On this subject I do not hesitate to appeal to the treatise called "Leges Henrici primi." Though compiled under the Normans, it gives in reality an account of the Saxon jurisprudence. This is asserted by the author. De his omnibus pleniorum suggerunt ventura (the sequel) notitiam, sicut Edvardi beatissimi principis extitisse temporibus certis indicibus et fida relatione cognovimus (p. 241). The same appears also from the numerous passages which are evidently translations from Saxon laws still extant; whence it is fair to conclude that much of the rest has been drawn from other documents which have perished in the long lapse of seven hundred years.

facilitated by a custom, which has already been mentioned. In all cases in which property, whether real or personal, was concerned; if a man claimed by gift or purchase; if stolen goods were found in his possession, or he had forcibly entered on the lands of others; he was bound to produce the testimony of the court and witnesses, before whom the transaction, on which he grounded his own right, must, if it had been lawful, have taken place. On this testimony in civil actions the judges frequently decided; but if either party advanced assertions of such a nature that they could not be proved by evidence, he was put on his oath, and was ordered to bring forward certain freeholders, his neighbours, acquainted with his character and concerns, who should swear that, in their consciences, they believed his assertion to be true. The number of these was in many cases fixed by the law, in others left to the discretion of the court. Sometimes four or five sufficed; sometimes forty or fifty were required; occasionally men came forward spontaneously, and offered themselves by hundreds to swear in behalf of a favoured or much-injured individual.¹ But it should be observed that the value of such oath was estimated by the rank and opulence of the individual. The oath of a king's thane was equal to the oaths of six ceorls, the oath of an ealdorman to those of six thanes. The king and the archbishop, as their word was deemed sacred, were exempted from the obligation of swearing; and the same indulgence was sometimes extended to the higher orders of the nobility.² If the matter still remained doubtful, it became usual to select a jury of free tenants, who left the court, deliberated among themselves, and returned a verdict, which decided the question.³ On some occasions a time was fixed within which the party was bound to bring forward his jurors. Thus, in a disputed claim of property between the bishop of Worcester and the clergy of Berkeley, it was decreed by the witan, that the bishop, being in actual possession of the land, and of the land-books, should be allowed to establish his right by oath; and we find that thirty days later he produced to swear in his favour at Westminster, fifty priests, ten deacons, and sixty clerks.⁴ To this I may add another instance in which recourse was had to each mode of proceeding, and judgment was given on grounds that to us must appear irregular and unsatisfactory. In a court held at Wendlebury, in which the ealdorman Ailwin, and the sheriff Edric presided, an action was brought against the monks of Ramsay, by Alfnoth, for the purpose of recovering the possession of two hides at Stapleford. After much litigation the decision was left to a jury of thirty-six thanes, who were chosen equally by the plaintiff and the defendants. While they were out of court deliberating on their verdict, Alfnoth publicly challenged the monks to prove their claim by oath. The challenge was accepted; but when they were prepared to swear, the ealdorman arose, observed that he was the patron of the abbey, and offered

¹ Thus a thousand persons offered to swear in behalf of the thane Wolfnoth.—Hist. Elfen. 479. It was called by the Saxons the lada, by later writers wager of law. How far it is allowed in modern times may be seen in Blackstone, l. ii. c. 22, sec. vi.

² Leg. Sax. 72, 262. Much ridicule has been thrown on this custom; but where inquiry was excluded, it was perhaps wise to attach a greater value to the oaths of persons, who by their rank and opulence were the furthest removed from the ordinary temptations to perjury, and who had more to forfeit, if they should be proved guilty of that crime.

³ Hist. Ram. 416, 418. Regist. Roff. 32. May not these juries be considered as the origin of our present juries in civil causes?

⁴ Cod. Dipl. i. 276. See another instance in p. 279.

himself to take the oath in its favour. This decided the cause. The court, through respect for its president, was satisfied with his word, adjudged the two hides to the monks, and condemned Alfnoth in the forfeiture of his lands and chattels. By the interest of his friends the latter part of the judgment was revoked, on condition that he would never more disturb the abbey in the possession of Stapleford.¹

In criminal prosecutions the proceedings, though grounded on the same principles, were in many respects different. It was ordered by law, that as soon as the hundred-mote was assembled (the same probably held with respect to other similar tribunals), the reeve with the twelve oldest thanes should go out to inquire into all offences committed within the jurisdiction of the court, and should be sworn "not to foresay (present) any one who was innocent, not to conceal any one who was guilty."² On their presentment, or the accusation of the prosecutor and his witnesses, the prisoner was frequently condemned; if any doubt existed, his plea of not guilty was admitted, and after his lord had been called upon to speak to his character upon oath, he was at liberty to prove his innocence by the purgation of lada or swearing, or the ordeal or judgment of God. In the purgation by oath, he began by calling on God to witness that he was innocent both in word and work of the crime laid to his charge. He then produced his com-purgators, who swore that "they believed his oath to be upright and clean."³ It was required that these compurgators or jurors should be his neighbours, or resident within the jurisdiction of the court, freeholders who had never been arraigned for theft, nor ever convicted of perjury, and who were now acknowledged for "true men" by all present. Their number differed according to the custom of the district; and was always increased, if the testimony of the lord were wanting, or had proved unfavourable. They were sometimes appointed by the judges, sometimes drawn by lot, often brought into the court by the party himself, an indulgence which enabled him to rest his fate on the decision of his friends and dependants, whom he might already have prejudiced in his favour. In Wessex he was permitted to choose thirty jurors, of whom fifteen were rejected by the judges; in East Anglia and Northumbria he produced forty-eight, out of whom twenty-four were appointed by ballot.⁴ If they corroborated his oath by their own in the form established by law, his innocence was acknowledged.

If, on the contrary, recourse was had to the ordeal, pledges were given for the trial, and the time was fixed by the court. As the decision was now left to the Almighty, three days were spent by the accused in fasting and prayer. On the third he was adjured by the priest not to go to the ordeal, if he were conscious of

¹ Hist. Ram. 415, 416.

² Leg. Sax. 117. This is evidently the origin of our grand juries. Mr. Reeves in his valuable History of the English Law, says, that the earliest mention of a trial by jury, that bears a near resemblance to that which this proceeding became in after-times, is in the Constitution of Clarendon under Henry II., which orders that if nobody appears to accuse an offender before the archdeacon, the sheriff, at the request of the bishop, faciet jurare duodecim legales homines de vicineto, seu de villa, quod inde veritatem secundum conscientiam suam manifestabunt (p. 87). This appears to me to be no more than an inquest resembling that of the Saxon times mentioned in the preceding law of Ethelred. They are accusers or witnesses, not judges.

³ The oaths are in Wilkins, Leg. Sax. 63, 64.

⁴ Leg. Sax. 8, 12, 27, 47, 125, 262, 264. At Winchelsea the institution continued in the hundred court as late as the reign of Henry VI. In the leiger-book of the borough, the compurgators are called, like our present juries, the country by whom the prisoner is tried.—See the extract in Sir F. Palgrave's Eng. Commonwealth, ii. cxvii.

guilt; he was then communicated with these words: "May this body and blood of Christ be to thee a proof of innocence this day:" after which, he again swore that he was guiltless of the crime of which he had been accused. The ordeals which were most in use were those by hot water and fire. For the former a fire was kindled under a caldron in a remote part of the church. At a certain depth below the surface, which was augmented in the absence of a favourable character from the lord, was placed a stone or piece of iron of a certain weight. Strangers were excluded; the accuser and the accused, each attended by twelve friends, proceeded to the spot; and the two parties were arranged in two lines opposite each other. After the litanies had been recited, a person was deputed from each line to examine the caldron, and if they agreed that the water boiled, and the stone was placed at the proper depth, the accused advanced, plunged in his arm, and took out the weight. The priest immediately wrapped a clean linen cloth round the part which was scalded, fixed on it the seal of the church, and opened it again on the third day. If the arm were perfectly healed, the accused was pronounced innocent; if not, he suffered the punishment of his offence. In the ordeal by fire, the same precautions were employed in respect of the number and position of the attendants. Near the fire a space was measured equal to nine of the prisoner's feet, and divided by lines into three equal parts. By the first stood a small stone pillar. At the beginning of the mass a bar of iron of the weight of one or three pounds, was laid on the fire; at the last collect it was taken off, and placed on the pillar. The prisoner immediately grasped it in his hand, made three steps on the lines previously traced on the floor, and threw it down. The treatment of the burn, and the indications of guilt or innocence, were the same as those in the ordeal by hot water.¹

Before I dismiss this subject, I may observe that the national manners opposed many obstacles to the impartial administration of justice. The institution of lord and vassal secured to the litigants both abettors and protectors: and the custom of making presents on all occasions polluted the purity of every tribunal. In criminal prosecutions, conviction was generally followed by pecuniary punishments: of which a part, if not the whole, was the perquisite of the principal judge, or of the lord of the court. In civil causes, the influence of money was employed to retard or accelerate the proceedings, to defeat the upright, or support the iniquitous claimant. Bribery, under the disguise of presents, found its way to the prince on the throne, as well as to the reeve in his court. When Athelstan the priest was prosecuted for theft and sacrilege by his bishop, he sold an estate at a nominal price to the ealdorman Wulstan, on condition that he would prevent the trial; and when Alfwin, abbot of Ramsey, despaired of protecting the interests of his monastery against the superior influence of Alfric, he gave twenty marks of gold to King Edward, five

¹ Leg. Sax. 26, 27, 53, 61, 131. It is evident from our ancient writers, that many persons established their innocence by these trials; whence it has been inferred that the clergy were in possession of a secret, by which they either prevented, or rapidly cured, the burn. Yet it is difficult to conceive that such a secret, so widely diffused, and so frequently applied, could have escaped the knowledge of judges and legislators, anxious to prevent the commission of crime; or, if it did not, to account for the conduct of such persons in continuing for several centuries to enforce the trial by ordeal for the discovery of guilt, while they knew that the whole process was an imposture.

to Queen Editha, for the interposition of the royal authority in his favour.¹ We frequently meet with complaints of the expense and uncertainty of judicial proceedings; and many individuals deemed it more prudent to sit down in silence under their present losses, than to injure themselves still more deeply by purchasing the protection of their friends and judges.²

The crimes to which the Anglo-Saxons were principally addicted, were homicide and theft. Among men of violent passions, often intoxicated, always armed, quarrels, riots, and murders were inevitable; and as long as the laws refused to exact blood for blood, the right of inflicting punishment naturally devolved upon the family of the slain. Hence arose those deadly and hereditary feuds, which for so many centuries disgraced the legislation, and disturbed the tranquillity, of the European nations. One murder provoked another: the duty of revenge was transmitted as a sacred legacy to posterity; and the chieftains of the same people often regarded each other as more deadly enemies than the very invaders against whom they were arrayed. Of this the reader has already seen a memorable instance in the alternate murders which for several generations harassed two of the most powerful families in Northumbria. To an evil so deeply felt, and so loudly lamented, the legislature wanted courage to apply any other remedy than that of pecuniary compensation; the usual expedient of the savage who has committed homicide, and is reduced to the necessity either of constantly trembling for his own life, or of purchasing with presents the forbearance of his adversary. This inadequate species of atonement had been discovered by Tacitus among the ancient Germans:³ it was matured into a complete but singular system by our Anglo-Saxon ancestors. Every freeman was numbered in one of the three classes termed twyhind, syxhind, and twelfhind. The first comprised the ceorls, the third the royal thanes; under the second were numbered the intermediate orders of society. The were of these classes, the legal value of their lives, and legal compensation for their murder, advanced in proportion from two to six, and from six to twelve, hundred shillings. But that of an ealdorman was twice, of an etheling three times, of a king six times the were of a royalthane.⁴ To explain the manner in which the were was demanded and paid, let us suppose that a thane of the twelfhind class had been murdered. The homicide might, if he pleased, openly brave the resentment of those whose duty it was to revenge the murder; or he might seek to fortify himself against their attempts within the walls of his own house; or he might flee for protection to one of the asylums appointed by the laws. In none of these cases were his enemies permitted to proceed immediately to the work of vengeance. The object of the legislature was to gain time, that the passions might cool, and the parties be reconciled. If he were found in the open air, it was unlawful to put him to death, unless he obstinately refused to surrender. If he shut himself up in

¹ Hist. Ram. 457. Hist. Elien. 482.

² Ibid. 414, 457, 458.

³ Suscipere tam inimicitias seu patris, seu propinqui, quam amicitiis necesse est.—Luitur etiam homicidium certo armentorum ac pecorum numero, recipitque satisfactionem universa domus.—Tac. Germ. xxi.

⁴ Leg. 63, 64, 71. On account of the progressive rise of the were, all above the rank of ceorls were called dear-born.—Leg. 20. The were was the great privilege of the higher classes. For every offence against them was punished in proportion to their were, and in consequence their persons and properties were better secured than those of their inferiors.—Leg. 25, 37, 39, 40.

his house, it might indeed be surrounded to prevent his escape, but a week must be suffered to elapse before any hostile attempt could be made. If he sought an asylum, the palace of a king, etheling, or archbishop afforded him a respite of nine days; a consecrated church, and the house of an ealdorman or bishop, a respite of seven days. Sometimes he preferred to fight, and much innocent blood was shed: for it was the duty of the vassal on such occasions to succour his lord, and of the lord to hasten with his retainers to the aid of his vassal. Sometimes he surrendered himself a captive into the hands of his enemies, who were compelled to keep him unhurt for the space of thirty days. If during that interval he could procure sureties for the payment of the were, he was set at liberty; otherwise his person and his life were abandoned to the mercy of his captors.¹ When the were was offered, the following was the proceeding according to law. Twelve sureties, of whom eight were paternal and four maternal relatives of the murderer, gave bond for the faithful payment of the mulct; and immediately both parties swore on their arms "to keep the king's peace" towards each other. After the lapse of three weeks, one hundred and twenty shillings, the healsfang, or price of liberation from captivity, were divided among the father, the son, and the brothers of the slain. Three weeks later an equal sum, under the name of manbote, was paid to the lord as a compensation for the loss of his vassal.² After another interval of three weeks, the fight-wite, or penalty for fighting, which differed in its amount according to circumstances, was received by the king, or the lord within whose jurisdiction the murder had been committed. Another delay of twenty-one days was allowed before the first general payment of the were to all the relations of the deceased: and then terms were amicably adjusted for the liquidation of the remainder by instalments in money or cattle. When the atonement was completed, the families were reconciled, and all remembrance of the offence was supposed to be obliterated.³

Robbery was another species of crime, the constant repetition of which disturbed the peace of society, and bade defiance to the wisdom and severity of the legislature. It prevailed among every order of men. We meet with it in the clergy as well as the laity; among thanes no less than ceorls. These depredators frequently associated in bands. Within the number of seven, they were termed in law thiofas: above that number, but below thirty-six, they formed a hlothe; if they were still more numerous, they were denominated an army; and to each of these different designations a different punishment was assigned.⁴ In an open and thinly-inhabited country it was easy for plunderers of this description to drive away by stealth, or carry off by force, the cattle from distant farms. To impede the disposal of property which had been stolen in this manner, the legislature encumbered every legal sale with a multiplicity of oaths and forms; and to promote its discovery, offered to the owner every facility which might enable him to pursue the offenders through the neighbouring counties.⁵ But the frequency proves the inutility of these enactments: and from the increasing severity of the punishment we may infer that the

¹ Leg. 43, 44, 110.

² The manbote for one of the tywind class was thirty; of the sywind, eighty shillings.—Leg. 25.

³ Leg. 53, 54, 75, 260, 270.

⁴ Ibid. 17.

⁵ Ibid. 18, 41, 43, 53, 66, 69, 80, 81.

evil was stubborn and unconquerable. At first the thief was condemned to make threefold reparation; afterwards to pay the amount of his were, or suffer banishment or death: then his property was confiscated to the crown, and his life was placed at the mercy of the king; lastly, he was ordered to be put to death without the possibility of pardon, and one-third of his property was given to the king, a second to the guild or tything from which he had stolen, and the remainder to his widow and children.¹ This severity was however mitigated by Athelstan: and the life of the thief was spared, if he were under the age of fifteen, or had stolen to a less amount than the value of a shilling. Canute abolished the punishment of death altogether. His object was to chastise the offender, but at the same time to allow him time to repent. On the first conviction the thief was condemned to make double reparation to the man whom he had injured, to pay his were to the king, and to find sureties for his future behaviour. A repetition of the crime subjected him to the loss of a hand, or a foot, or of both. If he reverted again to his former practices, the incorrigible offender was either scalped, or suffered the loss of his eyes, nose, ears, and upper lip. So strangely blended were lenity and cruelty in the judicial punishments of our ancestors.²

Of the several classes hitherto described as constituting the Anglo-Saxon commonwealth, the most numerous was that of the ceorls attached to the glebe.³ It has been disputed whether they were freemen or slaves; but give them what denomination you please, the fact is certain, that they could not lawfully separate themselves from the spot on which they were born, nor emancipate themselves from the service of the lord by whom they were owned.⁴ If ever they acquired the full rights of freemen, they derived the benefit from his wants or his gratitude, prevailing on him to commute for certain the uncertain conditions of their servitude, or to accept a fixed and annual payment in lieu of all other services. There remains, however, another class of men of still inferior caste, slaves in the full sense of the word, and condemned to suffer the evils of bondage in its most degrading form.⁵ That all the first adventurers were freemen, there can be little doubt: but in the course of their conquests it is probable that they found, it is certain that they made, a great number of slaves. The

¹ Leg. 2, 7, 12, 17, 65.

² Ibid. 70, 138.

³ According to the enumeration in Domesday, these ceorls, under the names of villeins, cottars, and bordars, amounted in England to 183,024, whilst the freemen were only 30,005, the slaves 26,552. The burghers, many of whom were ceorls of the same description, were numbered at 17,105.—See table at end of first vol. of Sir James Mackintosh's History.

⁴ They could even be transferred at the will of their lord from his manor to the manor of another lord. Thus, when Ethelred, dux et patricius gentis Merciorum, gave Readoner to the church of Worcester; to increase the value of the gift, he took, with permission of King Alfred, six men from the royal villa of Bensington, and "booked them with their teans and tudder (their families and posterity)" into Rea-

doran, "for the church of Worcester, as a perpetual inheritance for ever."—Cod. Dipl. ii. 108-B.

⁵ Leg. 15, 63, 103. It appears that slaves, no less than freemen, were sureties for the behaviour of each other. In the reign of Athelstan, when the punishment of theft was the most severe, a law was made respecting the offences committed by slaves against others than their masters. A man thief was ordered to be stoned to death by twenty of his fellows, each of whom was punished with three whippings, if he failed thrice to hit the culprit. A woman thief was burnt by eighty women slaves, each of whom brought three billets of wood to the execution. If she failed, she was likewise subjected to the punishment of three whippings. After the death of the offender, each slave paid three pennies as a fine, to the proprietor.—Leg. Athel. apud Brompt. 849 posterity of these men inherited the lot of their fathers; and their number was continually increased by the free-born Saxons, who had been reduced to the same condition by debt, or had been made captives in war, or had been deprived of liberty in punishment of their crimes, or had spontaneously surrendered it to escape the horrors of want.¹ The degradation and enslavement of a freeman were performed before a competent number of witnesses. The unhappy man laid on the ground his sword and his lance, the symbols of the free, took up the bill and the goad, the implements of slavery, and falling on his knees, placed his head, in token of submission under the hands of his master.²

It should, however, be observed that the hardships of their condition were considerably mitigated by the influence of religion. The bishop was appointed the protector of the slaves within his diocese; and his authority was employed in shielding them from oppression. Their lords were frequently admonished that slave and freeman were of equal value in the eyes of the Almighty; that both had been redeemed at the same price; and that the master would be judged with the same rigour as he had exercised towards his dependants.³ Nor were these unfortunate beings left without the hope of recovering their liberty; and this pleasing prospect acted as a powerful stimulus on their industry; for we read of some who acquired property sufficient to purchase their freedom.

Others owed that benefit to the gratitude of their masters, many to the pity of the humane and charitable.⁴ When the celebrated Wilfrid had received from Edewelch, king of Sussex, the donation of the Isle of Selsey, with two hundred and fifty male and female slaves, the bishop instructed them in the Christian faith, baptized them, and immediately made them free.⁵ Their manumission was an act of charity frequently inculcated by the preachers; and in most of the wills which are still extant, we meet with directions for granting liberty to a certain number of slaves. But the commiseration of the charitable was more excited by the condition of the wite theow (those who had been reduced to slavery by a judicial sentence) than of such as had been born in that state, and had never tasted the blessing of liberty. By the bishops in the council of Calcuith it was agreed to free at their decease every slave of that description; and similar provisions are inserted in the wills of the Lady Wenflæda, of Athelstan, son of King Ethelred, and of Ælfric, archbishop of Canterbury.⁶ Their manumission, to be legal, was to be performed in public, in the market, in the court of the hundred, or in the church at the foot of the principal altar. The lord taking the hand of the slave, offered it to the bailiff, sheriff, or clergyman, gave him a sword and a lance, and told him that the ways were open, and that he was at liberty to go wheresoever he pleased.⁷

¹ Leg. 15, 16, 22. That Saxons of one nation made slaves of the Saxons of another nation, if taken in war, appears from Bede, iv. 22. This custom must have furnished a great number of slaves.

² Leg. 271.

³ Spelm. Con. 405.

⁴ Thus "Elfy the Red bought himself out for one pound."—Lye, App. v. Brightmar purchased the freedom of himself, his wife Ælgiva, their children, and grandchildren, for two pounds.—Hickes, Diss. Epis. 8. Siwin bought Sydefleda into perpetual freedom for five shillings and some pence. Ægilmar bought Sethryth for three manusses, to be free after the death of himself and his wife.—Lye, App. v.

⁵ Bed. iv. 13.

⁶ Wil. Con. 171. Mores, p. 63. Lye, App. v. Hickes, Pref. xxiii. See also Hist. Ram. 407.

⁷ Leg. ii. 229, 270. If a slave lived for a year and a day in any borough or castle, without being reclaimed by his master, he became free.—New Rymer, i. 2.

Before I conclude this subject, it is proper to add that the sale and purchase of slaves publicly prevailed during the whole of the Anglo-Saxon period. These unhappy men were sold like cattle in the market; and there is reason to believe that a slave was usually estimated at four times the price of an ox.¹ To the importation of foreign slaves no impediment had ever been opposed; the export of native slaves was forbidden under severe penalties.² But habit and the pursuit of gain had taught the Northumbrians to bid defiance to all the efforts of the legislature. Like the savages of Africa, they are said to have carried off, not only their own countrymen, but even their friends and relatives; and to have sold them as slaves in the ports of the continent.³ The men of Bristol were the last to abandon this nefarious traffic. Their agents travelled into every part of the country; they were instructed to give the highest price for females in a state of pregnancy; and the slave-ships regularly sailed from that port to Ireland, where they were sure of a ready and profitable market. Their obstinacy yielded, however, not to the severity of the magistrates, but the zeal of Wulstan, bishop of Worcester. That prelate visited Bristol several years successively; resided for months together in the neighbourhood; and preached on every Sunday against the barbarity and irreligion of the dealers in slaves. At last the merchants were convinced by his reasons, and in their guild solemnly bound themselves to renounce the trade. One of the members was soon afterwards tempted to violate his engagement. His perfidy was punished with the loss of his eyes.⁴

From the population of the country we may pass to the inhabitants of the cities and boroughs; of which a few perhaps might be of recent origin, having sprung up under the protection of some powerful chieftain, or celebrated monastery; but the greater part had existed from the time of the Romans, and successively passed into the hands of the Britons, Saxons, and Northmen. Of these the more early history is lost in the gloom of ages; it is only towards the close of the Anglo-Saxon dynasty that we are able to discover some, and those but imperfect, traces of their municipal polity, which seems to have been founded on the same principles as that which prevailed in the surrounding country. In both we discover the lord and the tenant; the lord with his reeve, his court, his right of tallage, and his receipt of rents, and fines, and forfeitures; and, on the other hand, the tenant, holding of the lord by every variety of service, from that which was deemed honourable to the lowest and most debasing. In the towns, however, this principle was variously modified, to meet the wants and conveniences of large masses of men congregated on one spot; and hence it happened that their inhabitants gradually acquired advantages denied to their equals in the country. They possessed the benefit of a market for the sale of their wares and merchandise; they were protected by their union and numbers from the depredations of robbers and banditti; and, which subsequently proved to them a source of incalculable benefit, they formed one body politic with common rights and common interests. They had their hall or hanse-house, in which they met and deliberated; they exer-

¹ John bought Gunilda from a Gada for half a pound of silver, and gave her to the church of St. Peter.—Lye, App. v. Wulfric bought Elfritha for half a pound. Egilsig bought Wynric for an yre of gold.—Ibid.

The toll in the market of Lewes was one penny for the sale of an ox, four pennies for that of a slave.—Domesday.

² Leg. 17, 93, 107, 134.

³ Malms. 8.

⁴ Ang. Sac. ii. 258.

cised the power of enacting by (or borough) laws for the government and improvement of the borough;¹ and they possessed, by lease or purchase, houses, pasture, and forest lands for the common use and benefit of the whole body.² This gradually led to the emancipation of the inhabitants; for the lords chiefly valued their own rights on account of the income derived from them; and, therefore, they felt no objection to transfer the exercise of such rights to the burgesses themselves, in return for a large sum of money, or for a yearly rent during a certain term. Of such bargains there are many instances in Domesday.³

The larger towns were divided into districts, called in some places "wards," in some "shires," and in others "ferlings, or quarters."⁴ Among the inhabitants we meet with men of considerable wealth and influence holding over their own property in the borough, and transmitting with it to their heirs, the enviable jurisdiction of sac and soc.⁵ They had also their guilds or companies, consisting in some, and probably in all, instances, of men of the same trade or profession, and possessing common property, and a common hall for the purposes both of consultation and entertainment.⁶

The principal magistrate was the provost, called the wic-reeve, to distinguish him from the shire-reeve, or reeve of the county. Whether he owed his situation to the nomination of the lord, or to the choice of the burgesses, is perhaps a doubtful question. The wic-reeve of the more populous towns is always mentioned as an officer of great importance, and sometimes numbered among the noblest in the land.⁷ It was his duty to collect the revenue of the king or lord, to watch over his interests, and to exercise within the limits of the

¹ In the charter of Thurstan, the first Norman archbishop of York, which secured to the burgesses of Beverley all the privileges enjoyed by the citizens of York, we find mention of suam hanshus, ut ibi pertractant statuta sua ad.....totius villatus emendationem.—New Rym. i. 10. Now it should be observed that this charter, as appears on the very face of it, is not a grant of new, but a confirmation of former rights; and consequently refers to the Anglo-Saxon period. It supposes that the burgesses are already a body corporate with the right of self-government.

² Domesd. i. 1, 2, 100, 189, 154, 366; ii. 107.

³ Thus the men of Dover had bargained with the king to furnish to him yearly twenty ships manned with twenty-one mariners each, during fifteen days, in return for the privilege of exercising over themselves the jurisdiction of sac and soc.—Domesd. i. 1. The men of Oxford paid to him 20*l.* a year, and a certain quantity of honey, in lieu of all customs.—Ibid. 154. The citizens of Worcester had bought up every burthen but the land rent.—Ibid. 172.

⁴ Thus Cambridge and Stamford were divided into wards (ibid. 189, 336); York into shires (298); Huntingdon into ferlings (203).

⁵ In Lincoln there were twelve individuals possessing this jurisdiction during the reign of Edward the Confessor; at the time of the compilation of Domesday, two of them were still alive and in possession; of five the sons were in possession; and the rights of the remaining five were held by five persons, probably heirs or purchasers of the property. Some writers have considered these twelve as local judges: but the record describes them in exactly the same words as it describes the holders of the same jurisdiction in several manors in the country, "lageman, i.e. habentes sacam et socam."—Domesd. i. 336. One of them, Ulf, the son of Swartebrande, had also the right of toll and team.—Ibid. Thus also in London several churches and citizens had the same right of sac and soc on their own property. Habeant socas suas cum omnibus consuetudinibus; ita quod hospites qui in sokis hospitabuntur, nulli dent consuetudines nisi illi cuius soka fuerit, vel ministro suo quem ibi posuerit.—New Rym. i. 11. I consider this charter as a confirmation of privileges "que habuerunt antecessores eorum."—Ibid.

⁶ There was in London a guild of English knights possessing a soke and land both within and without the city (New Rym. i. 11; Stevens, ii. 89); and another in Winchester, near the East gate. They had a common hall, ubi potabant gildam suam. The land belonging to them let for forty-two shillings.—Domes. iv. 531.

⁷ Chron. Sax. 97, 102. The most ancient wicreeve mentioned in history is Blæcca (Black or Blake), reeve of the city of Lincoln in 628.—Bede, ii. 16.

borough the same authority which the sheriff exercised within the shire. From the manner in which London, Winchester, York, Exeter, and some other places, are casually mentioned by the most ancient chroniclers, it is plain that the inhabitants formed distinct bodies of men, not only possessing forms of municipal government, but also exercising considerable influence in matters of state.¹

In the different boroughs, sometimes in different divisions of the same borough, there prevailed a variety of local customs and services, the establishment of which originated in the wants, the caprice, or the favour of the several proprietors. For these the reader must consult the pages of Domesday, the only source of authentic information on the subject; yet even there he will meet with only imperfect and unsatisfactory notices which accidentally escaped from the pens of the compilers, whilst they sought to record, not the immunities and customs of the people, but the claims and the receipts of the sovereign.

¹ Chron. Sax. 135, 143, 148, 150, 174. Encom. Emmæ, 15. Gul. Pict. 143, &c.

CHAPTER VIII.

WILLIAM I.

SURNAMED THE CONQUEROR.

WILLIAM I.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Emperor of Germany. HENRY IV.	King of Scotland. MALCOLM III.	King of France. PHILIP I.	Kings of Spain. SANCHO II. died in 1072. ALPHONSO VI.	Popes. ALEXANDER II. died in 1073. GREGORY VII. 1085. VICTOR III. 1087.
---	--	-------------------------------------	--	---

WILLIAM, Duke of Normandy +1087. MATILDA, Daughter of Baldwin V. Earl of Flanders. +1063.

1. Robert, = Sibylla, Duke of Normandy. +1134.	Richard. +1100.	WILLIAM II. Matilda, = of Scotland. +1118.	HENRY I. = Adeleis, of Louvain.	Adela. = Stephen, Earl of Blois.	Several other Daughters.
2. William, = Joan, Earl of Flanders. Savoy. +1126.	William, = Matilda, Duke of Normandy. Anjou. +1119.	Henry IV. = Matilda, = Emperor of Germany. +1126.	Geoffrey, of Anjou. +1150.	William. Theobald, Earl of Blois. +1151.	Henry, Bishop of Win- chester. +1171.
3. HENRY II. = Eleanor. +1180.	Geoffrey, Earl of Nantes. +1167.	William. +1163.	Baldwin.	Eustace, = Constantia, Earl of Boulogne. France. +1152.	William, Earl of Boulogne. +1150.
4. William. Henry. +1156.	Margaret, Daughter of Louis VII. +1198.	RICHARD, = Berengaria, of Navarre. +1199.	Geoffrey, = Constance, Earl of Bretagne. +1186.	JOHN, = Isabella, of Angou- leme. +1216.	Matilda. Eleanor. Joan.
		Arthur.			HENRY III.

CHAPTER VIII.

WILLIAM I.

SURNAMED THE CONQUEROR.—A.D. 1066.

WILLIAM IS CROWNED—RETURNS TO NORMANDY—INSURRECTIONS—TOTAL SUBJUGATION OF THE KINGDOM—DEPRESSION OF THE NATIVES—KNIGHTS' FEES—INCIDENTS OF MILITARY TENURES—INNOVATIONS IN JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS—DOMESDAY—KING'S REVENUE—INSURRECTION OF NORMAN BARONS—REBELLION OF ROBERT, THE KING'S SON—WAR WITH FRANCE—WILLIAM'S DEATH—AND CHARACTER.

AMONG the most formidable of the sea-kings in the beginning of the tenth century was Rollo, who, from his activity, had acquired the surname of "the ganger." The north of France was the theatre of his exploits: and the maritime provinces which had already been ravaged by Hastings, were laid desolate by the repeated invasions of this restless barbarian. But the man, before whom so many armies had fled, was subdued by the zeal or the eloquence of an ecclesiastic. In 912, Franco, the archbishop of Rouen, persuaded him to embrace the faith of the gospel, and to acknowledge himself the vassal of the French crown. As the price of his acquiescence he received the hand of Gisla, the daughter of Charles the Simple, and with her that extensive tract of land which is bounded by the ocean, the river Epte, and two provinces of Maine and Bretagne. From its new settlers this territory acquired the appellation of Normandy, or the land of the Northmen.

Rollo left his dominions to his posterity, a race of able and fortunate princes, who assumed indifferently the titles of earl, or marquis, or duke. The necessity of cultivating a desert introduced habits of industry and subordination among the colonists. Their numbers were repeatedly multiplied by the accession of new adventurers; and that spirit of enterprise and contempt of danger which had distinguished their fathers in the pursuit of plunder, soon enabled them to reach, and even to outstrip, their neighbours in the career of civilization. For their rapid improvement they owed much to the wisdom and justice of their princes: still more to the influence of religion, which softened the ferocity of their manners, impelled them to cultivate the useful and ornamental arts, and opened to their curiosity the stores of ancient literature. Within less than one hundred and fifty years from the baptism of Rollo, the Normans were ranked among the most polished, as well as the most warlike, nations of Europe.

The fifth in succession from Rollo was Robert II., who contributed to restore to his throne Henry, king of France, and received from the gratitude of that monarch the Vexin as an addition to his patrimonial dominions. In the eighth year of his government curiosity or devotion induced him to undertake a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. His reputation had gone before him. In every country he was received with respect; at Constantinople the Grecian emperor paid him distinguished honours; and on his approach to Jerusalem the gates of the city were gratuitously thrown open by the command of the emir. But his constitution sank under the fatigues of his journey and the heat of the climate. He died on his way home, at Nice, in Bithynia.

To Robert, in the year 1027, Herleva, the daughter of an officer of his household, had borne an illegitimate son, William, afterwards duke of Normandy, and king of England. This child strongly interested the affections of his father; who, before his departure, in an assembly of the barons at Fescamp, prevailed on them to acknowledge him for heir apparent to the duchy. The earl Gilbert was appointed his guardian; and the king of France solemnly engaged to protect the rights of his orphan vassal. But the guardian was slain; the interests of William were neglected; and his dominions, during the time of his minority, exhibited one continued scene of anarchy and bloodshed, originating in the lawless violence and conflicting rapacity of the barons. At the age of nineteen William first took the field, to support his claim to the succession against the legitimate descendants of Richard II., the father of Robert; and with the aid of Henry defeated, in the valley of Dunes, Guy of Burgundy, his most formidable competitor. But during the campaign, the French king learned to fear the growing abilities of his pupil. He turned his arms against the young prince, joined his forces to those of William of Arques, a second pretender to the dukedom, and afterwards on two occasions marched a numerous army into Normandy to the assistance of different insurgents. But the activity and bravery of William baffled all the efforts, and at last extorted the respect, of his adversaries: his alliance was courted by the neighbouring princes; Baldwin of Flanders gave him his daughter Matilda in marriage; and when he undertook the invasion of England, he was universally reputed one of the boldest knights, and most enterprising sovereigns in Christendom.¹

The progress of that invasion, from its origin to the battle of Senlac, has been related in the preceding pages. From Senlac William returned to Hastings. He had fondly persuaded himself that the campaign was terminated; and that the natives, disheartened by the fall of their king and the defeat of their army, would hasten to offer him the crown.² A few days dissipated the illusion. London was put in a state of defence by the citizens; the inhabitants of Romney repulsed a division of the Norman fleet, which attempted to enter the harbour; and a numerous force, which had assembled at Dover, threatened to act on the rear of the invaders, if they proceeded towards the capital. The first object of William was to disperse the latter; and in his march he severely chastised the town of Romney. The force at Dover melted away at his approach; and the fears of the garrison induced them to offer him the keys of the place.³

This acquisition was an invaluable advantage to the Normans. The dysentery prevailed to an alarming degree in the army; and the castle of Dover, which at that time was deemed impregnable, offered a secure asylum for the multitude of the sick. Eight

¹ Guil. Pict. 40—404, ed. Mascher.

² Chron. Lanb. ad ann. 1066.

³ Pict. 137, 138. He thus describes the castle of Dover. Situm est id castellum in rupe mari contigua, quæ naturaliter acuta, undique ad hoc ferramentis elaborate incisa, in speciem muri directissima altitudine, quantum sagittæ jactus perimetri potest, consurgit, quo in latere unda marina alitur days were employed in adding to its means of defence, and in repairing the damages caused by an undisciplined soldiery, who, in defiance of their leader, had set fire to the town, that during the confusion, they might plunder the inhabitants. At length, having supplied his losses by reinforcements from Normandy, the conqueror commenced his march in the direction of London. By some writers we are gravely told, that during his progress, he saw himself gradually enveloped by what bore the appearance of a moving forest; that on a sudden the branches, which had been taken for trees, fell to the ground, and in their fall disclosed a host of archers with their bows ready bent, and their arrows directed against the invaders; that Stigand, archbishop of Canterbury, and Egelnoth, abbot of St. Augustine's, advancing from the crowd, demanded for the men of Kent the confirmation of their ancient laws and immunities; and that the demand was readily granted by the fears of the astonished Norman.¹ This story is the fiction of later ages, and was unknown to the more ancient writers, from whom we learn that, on his departure from Dover, William was met by the inhabitants of Kent with offers of submission, and received from them hostages as a security for their obedience.²

The witan had assembled in London immediately after the death of Harold. The population of this capital was numerous and warlike; and the number of its defenders had been increased by the thanes of the neighbouring counties. By their unanimous choice, the etheling Edgar, the rightful claimant, was placed on the throne. But Edgar was young, and devoid of abilities; the first place in the council devolved on Stigand, the metropolitan; and the direction of the military operations was committed to the two powerful earls, Edwin and Morcar. Their first effort was unsuccessful; and the confidence of the citizens was shaken by the feeble resistance which a numerous body of natives had opposed to an inferior force of five hundred Norman horse. William contented himself with burning the suburbs; he was unwilling or afraid to storm the walls; and resolved to punish his opponents by destroying their property in the open country. Leaving London, he spread his army over the counties of Surrey, Sussex, Hampshire, and Berkshire. Every thing valuable was plundered by the soldiers; and what they could not carry away, was committed to the flames.

In the mean time mistrust and disunion reigned among the advisers of Edgar. Every new misfortune was attributed to the incapacity or the treachery of the leaders. It was even whispered that Edwin and Morcar sought not so much the liberation of their country, as the transfer of the crown from Edgar to one of themselves. The two earls left the city; and their departure, instead of lessening, augmented the general consternation. The first who threw himself on the mercy of the conqueror was Stigand, who met William as he crossed the Thames at Wallingford, swore fealty to him as to his sovereign, and was received with the flattering appellation of father and bishop. His defection was followed by that of others; and the determination of those who wavered was accelerated by the rapidity with which the Norman pursued his plan of devastation. Buckinghamshire and part of the county of Hertford had been already laid waste, when a deputation arrived, consisting of Edgar, Edwin, and Morcar, on the part of the nobility; of the archbishop of York, and the bishops of Worcester and Hereford, on that of the clergy; and of the principal citizens of London, in the name of their fellows. At Berkhamstead they swore allegiance to the conqueror, gave hostages, and made him an offer of the crown. He affected to pause; and did not formally accept the proposal till the Norman barons had ratified it by their applause. He then appointed for his coronation the approaching festival of Christmas.¹

¹ Thorn. 1786.

² Occurrent ultro Cantuarii haud procul a Dovera, jurant fidelitatem, dant obsides.—

Pict. 138. This writer was with the army at the time.

The Normans, proud of their superior civilization, treated the natives as barbarians.² William placed no reliance on their oaths, and took every precaution against their hostility. But most he feared the inhabitants of London, a population brave, mutinous, and confident in its numbers. Before he would expose his person among them, he ordered the house, which he was to occupy, to be surrounded with military defences; and on the day of his coronation in Westminster Abbey, stationed in the neighbourhood a numerous division of his army (Dec. 25). As Stigand had been suspended from the archiepiscopal office, the ceremony was performed by Aldred, archbishop of York; and that prelate put the question to the English, the bishop of Coutances to the Normans, whether they were willing that the duke should be crowned king of England. Both nations expressed their assent with loud acclamations; and at the same moment, as if it had been a preconcerted signal, the troops in the precincts of the abbey set fire to the nearest houses, and began to plunder the city. The tumult within the church was not exceeded by that without. The Normans pictured to themselves a general rising of the inhabitants; the natives imagined that they had been drawn together as victims destined for slaughter. William, though he trembled for his life, refused to interrupt the ceremony. In a short time he was left with none but the prelates and clergy at the foot of the altar. The English, both men and women, had fled to provide for their own safety; and of the Normans some had hastened to extinguish the flames, the others to share in the plunder.³ The service was completed with precipitation; and the conqueror took the usual oath of the Anglo-Saxon kings, with this addition, that he would govern as justly as the best of his predecessors, provided the natives were true to him.⁴

To William, who sought to reconcile the two races, this unfortunate occurrence was a subject of deep regret. It inflamed all those jealousies and resentments which it was his interest to extinguish, and taught the natives to look upon their conquerors as perfidious and implacable enemies. To apologise for the misconduct of the Normans, it was alleged that the acclamations of loyalty in the church had been mistaken by the guard for shouts of insurrection. But in that case, it was asked, why did they not fly to the defence of the king? Why did they haberent.—Malm. f. 57. The narrative in the text is founded on the testimony of Pictaviensis (p. 141), Orderic (p. 187), the Chronicon Lambardi (ad ann. 1066), Malmesbury (De Pont. i. f. 118), and the ancient writer quoted by Simeon (col. 195), Florence (p. 634), and Hoveden (f. 258).

¹ I am aware that this account is very different from that which is generally given, in which Stigand appears to act the part of a patriot, and the success of William is attributed to the influence of the bishops, unwilling to offend the pope. But for all this there is no other authority than the mere assertion of Malmesbury, that after the departure of Edwin and Morcar, the other nobles would have chosen Edgar, if the bishops had seconded them. Ceteri Edgarum eligerent, si episcopus assertores

² Pictaviensis terms them without ceremony feros ac barbaros (p. 150—153).

³ Pict. p. 144, 146. Orderic, p. 139.

⁴ Flor. p. 634. Hoved. 258. Chron. Sax. ad ann. 1066

pretend to put down a rising in one quarter, by exciting a conflagration in another? There can be little doubt that the outrage was designed, and that it originated in the love of plunder. At Dover the Normans, though under the very eye of their leader, could not be restrained from pillage; at London the superior opulence of the citizens offered an irresistible temptation to their rapacity. This suspicion is confirmed by the subsequent conduct of the king. He assembled his barons, and admonished them, that by oppression they would drive the natives to rebellion, and bring indelible disgrace on themselves and their country. For the rest of the army he published numerous regulations. The frequenting of taverns was prohibited; the honour of the females was protected by the severest penalties; and proportionate punishments were affixed to every species of insult, rapine, and assault. Nor were these orders suffered to evaporate in impotent menaces; commissioners were appointed to carry them into effect.¹

William had hitherto been called "the bastard:"² from this period he received the surname of "the conqueror;" a term which, in the language of the age, did not necessarily involve the idea of subjugation, but was frequently employed to designate a person who had sought and obtained his right. In this sense it coincided with the policy of the new king, who affected to owe his crown not to the power of his arms, but to the nomination of Edward, and the choice of the natives. He has been represented as of a temper reserved and morose, more inclined to acts of severity than of kindness: but, if such were his natural disposition, he had the art to conceal, or the resolution to subdue it. All the first measures of his reign tended to allay the animosity, and to win the affections, of the English. No change was attempted in their laws or customs, but what the existing circumstances imperiously required. The citizens of London obtained a grant of all their former privileges, and the most decisive measures were employed to put down the bands of robbers which began to infest the country. In the collection of the royal revenue the officers received orders to avoid all unauthorized exactions, and to exercise their duty with lenity and moderation. For the protection of trade, the king's peace was granted to every traveller on the highway, and to every merchant and his servants resorting to any port or market. Access to the royal presence was refused to no one. William listened graciously to the complaints of the people; heard their causes in person; and, though his decisions were directed by the principles of justice, was careful to temper them with feelings of mercy. From London he retired to Barking, where his court was attended by crowds of English thanes. At their request he received their homage: and in return granted to all the confirmation, to several an augmentation, of their estates and honours.³ But nothing was more grateful to the national feelings than the attention which he paid to the etheling Edgar. To console the prince for the loss of that crown to which he was entitled by his birth, he admitted him into the

¹ Pict. 149. He adds: Etiam illa delicta, quæ fierent consensu impudicarum, infamie prohibendæ causa vetebantur.—Ib. Ord. 195.

² It was not deemed a term of reproach. William gave it to himself in many of his letters. Ego Willielmus cognomento bastardus.—See Spelman, Archæol. 77.

³ Pictaviensis mentions by name Edgar,

Edwin, Morcar, and Coxo, quem singulari et fortitudine et probitate regi et optimo cuique Normanno placuisse audivimus (p. 150). Orderic adds Turchil de Limis, Siward, and Aldred, the sons of Ethelgar, pronepotis regis, Edric the Wild, the grandson or nephew of Edric the Infamous, and many other noblemen (p. 195).

number of his intimate friends, and bestowed on him an extensive property, not unfitting by the last descendant of an ancient race of kings. From Barking he made a progress through the neighbouring counties. His route was distinguished by the numerous benefits which he scattered around him; and his affability and condescension to the spectators proved how anxious he was to procure their favour and to merit their esteem.¹

The constitution of the feudal armies was ill adapted to the preservation of distant conquests. The duration of their service was limited to a short period; and William was aware that, at the expiration of the term, his followers would expect to be discharged, and reconveyed to their own country. It was, however, manifest that the obedience of the natives could be secured only by a strong military force. At the king's solicitation several chieftains consented to remain with their retainers, and their compliance was rewarded with grants of valuable estates, to be holden by the tenure of military service. Whence the donations were made, whether from the royal demesnes, or from the lands of those who fell at the battle of Senlac, is uncertain; but we are told that the transaction was conducted according to the strict rules of justice, and that no Englishman could reasonably complain that he had been despoiled to aggrandize a Norman.²

This force was distributed among the more populous towns and districts. Wherever the king placed a garrison, he erected a fortress for its protection.

But London and Winchester were the chief objects of his solicitude. He would not leave Barking till a castle had been completed in London, probably on the very site which is now occupied by the Tower; and the care of raising a similar structure at Winchester was intrusted to the vigilance of Fitz-Osbern, the bravest and most favoured of his officers. "For that city," says his biographer, "is noble and powerful, inhabited by a race of men, opulent, fearless, and perfidious."³ Yet, if we recollect that these Norman castles were built in the short space of three months, and that too in the depth of winter, we must consider them as little better than temporary defences, which had been hastily erected in favourable situations.

Some writers have indulged in speculation on the motives which could have induced William, immediately after these arrangements, to quit the kingdom which he had so recently acquired, and to revisit his patrimonial dominions. It has been supposed that his real but secret object was the ruin of the English nobility. While he was present, their obedience excluded every decent pretext of spoliation; but during his absence they might be goaded to arms by the oppression of his officers, and at his return he might with apparent justice punish their rebellion, and satisfy his own rapacity and that of his barons. Such indeed was the result: but we often attribute to policy events which no deliberation has prepared, and which no foresight could have divined. There is nothing in the ancient

¹ Pict. 150. Orderic, 194—196.

² Pict. 150. At the same time he ordered the foundations of a monastery to be laid on the spot where he gained the victory over Harold, from which circumstance it was called Battle Abbey. As it was there that he won the crown, he wished the new establishment to enjoy all the privileges of the royal chapel; and having obtained the consent of the metropolitan and of the bishop of the diocese, declared it in a full assembly of prelates and barons exempt from "all episcopal rule and exaction." It became, in the language of later times, nullius diocesis.—See the charter, Brady, ii. App. p. 15; New Rymer, i. 4. The signature of the bishop is not in any copy of the charter now extant: it was in that possessed by the abbey.—Palgrave's Commonwealth, ii. lvi.

³ Pict. 151.

writers to warrant a supposition so disgraceful to the character of William. The men of Normandy were anxious to welcome their victorious sovereign; they had repeatedly importuned him to return; and vanity might prompt him to grant their request, and to exhibit himself with the pomp of a king among those whom he had hitherto governed with the inferior title of duke. In the month of March he collected his army on the beach near Pevensey, distributed to each man a liberal donative, and embarked with a prosperous wind for the coast of Normandy. He was received by his countrymen with enthusiastic joy: wherever he proceeded, the pursuits of commerce and agriculture were suspended; and the solemn fast of Lent was universally transformed into a season of festivity and merriment. In his train followed, not only the Norman barons, the faithful companions of his victory, but also many English thanes and prelates, the proudest ornaments of his triumph. The latter appeared in the honourable station of attendants on the king of England; in reality they were captives, retained as securities for the fidelity of their countrymen.¹ We are told that they attracted the admiration of the spectators, among whom were many French noblemen whom curiosity had brought to the Norman court. In their persons the English were thought to exhibit the elegance of female beauty. Their hair (long hair was a mark of birth with the northern nations) flowed in ringlets on their shoulders; and their mantles of the richest silks were ornamented with the profusion of oriental magnificence.² To enhance in the eyes of his guests and subjects the value of his conquests, William displayed before them the treasures which he had either acquired as plunder after the battle, or received at his coronation as presents. Of these a considerable portion, with the golden banner of Harold, was destined for the acceptance of the pope; the remainder was distributed among the churches of Normandy and the neighbouring provinces. The remark of the continental historian, on this occasion, will amuse, perhaps surprise, the reader. Speaking of the riches brought from England, he says, "That land far surpasses the Gauls in abundance of the precious metals. If in fertility it may be termed the granary of Ceres, in riches it should be called the treasury of Arabia. The English women excel in the use of the needle, and in the embroidery of gold: the men in every species of elegant workmanship. Moreover, the best artists of Germany reside among them; and merchants import into the island the most valuable specimens of foreign manufacture."³ By exaggerating the advantages of the country, Pictaviensis may perhaps have sought to add to the fame of its conqueror; but one part of his description is fully supported by other evidence. The superiority of the English artists was so generally acknowledged, that articles of delicate workmanship in embroidery, or in the precious metals, were usually denominated by the other European nations "opera Anglica," or English work.⁴

During his absence the king had intrusted the reins of government to William Fitz-Osbern, and Odo,

¹ They were Stigand, archbishop of Canterbury; Egelnoth, abbot of St. Augustine's; Edgar the etheling; Edwin, earl of Mercia; Morcar, earl of Northumbria; Waltheof, earl of Northampton and Huntingdon, and "complures alii altæ nobilitatis."—Pict. 153. Order. 197.

² Nec enim puellari venustati cedebant.—

Pict. 161. Miræ pulchritudinis.—Order. 197.

³ Pict. 157, 158. He appears to have been astonished at the wealth of the English. He calls them Filios Anglorum tam stemmatis quam opum dignitate reges appellandos.—Ibid.

⁴ Leo Marsicannus, apud Muratori, Antiq. Med. Ævi, diss. lviii.

bishop of Bayeux. Odo was his uterine brother, the son of Herleva by her husband Herluin.¹ The favour of William had promoted him at an early age to the see of Bayeux; and he soon displayed extraordinary abilities both in the administration of his diocese, and in the councils of his sovereign. He possessed a splendid revenue, and spent it in beautifying his episcopal city, and rewarding the services of his retainers. In obedience to the canons he forbore to carry arms; but he constantly attended his brother in battle, and assisted with his advice in every military enterprise. "He was," says an historian who had probably shared in his bounty, "a prelate of such rare and noble qualities, that the English, barbarians as they were, could not but love him and fear him."² On the other hand, we are assured by another well-informed and less partial writer, that his character was a compound of vice and virtue, and that, instead of attending to the duties of his station, he made riches and power the principal objects of his pursuit.³

To Odo had been assigned the government of Kent, the inhabitants of which, from their frequent intercourse with the continent, were deemed less savage than the generality of their countrymen.⁴ The remainder of the kingdom was committed to the vigilance of Fitz-Osbern, a Norman baron, related on the mother's side to the ducal family. William and he had grown up together from their infancy; and the attachment of their childish years had been afterwards strengthened by mutual services. In every civil commotion Fitz-Osbern had supported his sovereign; to his influence was attributed the determination of William to invade England; and to the praise of consummate wisdom in the cabinet he added that of unrivalled courage in the field. He was considered the pride of the Normans and the scourge of the English.⁵

The previous merits of these ministers must be received on the word of their panegyrist; but their subsequent conduct does not appear to merit the confidence which was reposed in them by their sovereign; and to their arrogance and rapacity should be attributed the insurrections, forfeitures, and massacres, which so long afflicted this unhappy country, and which at last reduced the natives to a state of beggary and servitude. As soon as they entered on their high office, they departed from the system of conciliation which the king had adopted, and assumed the lofty mien and the arrogant manners of conquerors. The complaints of the injured were despised; aggression was encouraged by impunity; and the soldiers in the different garrisons insulted the persons, abused the wives and daughters, and rioted at free quarters on the property of the natives.⁶ The refusal of redress awakened the indignation of the English; and in this moment of national effervescence, if an individual had come forward able to combine and direct the general hostility, the Norman ascendancy would probably have been suppressed. But the principal chieftains were absent; and the measures of the insurgents, without system or connection, were the mere result of sudden irritation, and better calculated for the purpose of present revenge than of permanent deliverance. Neither were the natives

¹ Herleva married Herluin after the death of Robert. Her children by this marriage were Robert, earl of Mortagne; Odo, bishop of Bayeux; and a daughter, countess of Albemarle.—Will. Gem. vii. 3; viii. 37

² Pict. 153.

³ Orderic, 255.

⁴ Unde a minus feris hominibus incolitur.—Pict. 152.

⁵ Pict. 151.

⁶ Orderic, 203.

unanimous. Numbers attended more to the suggestions of selfishness than of patriotism: the archbishop of York and several of the prelates, many thanes, who had hitherto been undisturbed, and the inhabitants of most of the towns, whose prosperity depended on the public tranquillity, remained quiet spectators of the confusion around them. Some even lent their aid to put down the insurgents.¹

Among the staunchest friends of the Normans was Copsi or Coxo, a thane who under Edward had governed Northumbria as the deputy of Tostig. With the title of earl, William had intrusted to his fidelity the government of the whole country to the north of the Tyne; nor was Copsi faithless or ungrateful to his benefactor. It was in vain that his retainers exhorted him to throw off the yoke of the foreigners. For a long time they wavered between their attachment to their lord and their attachment to their country. The latter prevailed; and Copsi fell by the swords of his vassals. By William his death was lamented as a calamity; by the Norman writers he is described as the most virtuous of the English.²

In the West the conqueror had bestowed on Fitz-Osbern the earldom of Hereford. Edric the Wild, or the Savage,³ whose possessions lay in that country, refused to acknowledge his authority. As often as the Normans attempted to enforce obedience, he repulsed them with loss; and, as soon as the king had left England, called to his aid Blethgent and Rithwatlan, princes of the Britons. Their united forces shut up the enemy within their fortress, while they ravaged with impunity the western division of the county, as far as the river Lug.⁴

In the East the people of Kent solicited the support of Eustace, count of Boulogne, who, offended at a decision given against him in a court of Norman barons and English thanes, had left the island in sullen discontent. At the invitation of the insurgents, he unexpectedly crossed the Channel; and a combined attack was made on the castle of Dover at a time when the larger portion of the garrison was absent. Unfortunately a panic seized the assailants, and they fled before a handful of men. Eustace reached his ships, though most of his followers were taken; by their more perfect knowledge of the roads, the natives escaped, from the paucity of their pursuers.⁵

These desultory conflicts might indeed harass the Normans, but they contributed little to prevent the entire subjugation of the country, or to promote the great cause of independence. The more prudent reserved their efforts for a fairer prospect of success; and deputies were sent to Denmark to offer to Sveno Estrithson a crown which had been already worn by two of his predecessors, Canute and Hardecanute.

After a short time, William, exasperated by frequent messages from Odo and Fitz-Osbern, returned to England with a secret resolution to crush by severity a people whom he could not win by kindness. During the Christmas holidays the English thanes waited on their sovereign. He

¹ Ibid. 206.

² Simeon, Hist. Dunel. iii. 14. Pict. 164. Orderic, 206. The native writers give a more circumstantial, and probably more accurate, account of his death. Osulf had enjoyed the same appointment from the gift of Morcar, but had been compelled by the Normans to surrender it to Copsi. Five weeks afterwards, on the 12th of March, he surprised his competitor in Newburn. Copsi ran to the church, which was set on fire. The flames drove him to the door, where he was cut down by Osulf.—Simeon, 204. Orderic, 243.

³ Cognomento Gaila, id est silvaticus. Orderic, 185. From silvaticus the French formed the word sauvage.

⁴ Simeon, 197. Flor. 635.

⁵ Pict. 163. Orderic, 205.

possession of the episcopal residence, and abandoned the houses of the citizens to the rapacity of his followers. During the night the English assembled in great force; about the dawn they burst into the city. The Normans, exhausted by the fatigue of their march, and the debauch of the last evening, fell for the most part unresisting victims to the fury of their enemies; the others fled to their leader at the palace of the bishop. For awhile they kept their pursuers at bay from the doors and windows; but in a short time the building was in flames, and Cumin with his associates perished in the conflagration. Of the whole number, two only escaped from the massacre.¹

This success revived the hopes of the English. The citizens of York rose upon the Norman garrison, and killed the governor with many of his retainers. They were immediately joined by Cospatric with the Northumbrians, and by Edgar with the exiles from Scotland. William Mallett, on whom the command had devolved, informed the king that without immediate succour he must fall into the hands of the enemy. But that prince was already on his march; he surprised the besiegers. Several hundreds perished; the city was abandoned to the rapacity of the soldiers; and the cathedral was profaned and pillaged. Having built a second castle and appointed his favourite Fitz-Osbern to the command, the king returned in triumph to Winchester.²

This was the most busy and eventful year in the reign of William. In June, the sons of Harold, with a fleet of sixty-four sail, returned a second time from Ireland, and landed near Plymouth. They separated in the pursuit of plunder, but were surprised by Brian, son of the earl of Bretagne. The leaders escaped to their ships; almost all their followers perished in two engagements fought on the same day.³

In July arrived the threatened expedition from Denmark. Sveno, who spent two years in making preparations, had summoned to his standard adventurers from every nation inhabiting the shores of the Baltic; and had intrusted the command of a fleet of two hundred and forty sail to the care of his eldest son Canute, aided by the counsel and experience of Sbern, his uncle, and Christian, his bishop. The Normans claim the praise of having repulsed the invaders at Dover, Sandwich, Ipswich, and Norwich: perhaps the Danes only touched at those places to inform the natives of their arrival, or to distract the attention of their enemy. In the beginning of August they sailed to the Humber, where they were joined by Edgar, Cospatric, Waltheof, Archil, and the five sons of Carl, with a squadron of English ships. Archbishop Aldred died of grief at the prospect of the evils which threatened his devoted country. The Normans at York, to clear the ground in the vicinity of their castles, set fire to the neighbouring houses; the flames were spread by the wind; and in a conflagration of three days, the cathedral and a great part of the city were reduced to ashes. During the confusion the Danes and English arrived, and totally defeated the enemy, who had the imprudence to leave their fortifications, and fight in the streets. Three thousand Normans were slain: for the sake of ransom, William Mal-

¹ Sim. Hist. Ecc. Dunel. iii. 15. De Gest. Reg. 198. Orderic, 218. Alur. Bev. 128.

² Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1068. Orderic, 218.

³ Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1068. Orderic, 219. Two of Harold's sons retired to Denmark: their sister, who accompanied them, was afterwards married to the sovereign of Russia.—Saxo Gram. 207.

lett with his family, Gilbert of Ghent, and a few others, were spared.¹

The king was hunting in the forest of Dean, when he received the first news of this disaster. In the paroxysm of his passion he swore by the splendour of the Almighty, that not one Northumbrian should escape his revenge. Acquainted with the menaces of Svenno, he had made preparations adequate to the danger; auxiliaries had been sought from every people between the Rhine and the Tagus; and to secure their services, besides a liberal allowance for the present, promises had been added of future and more substantial rewards. It was not the intention of the confederates to hazard an engagement, with so numerous and disciplined a force. As it advanced they separated. Waltheof remained for the defence of York; Cospatrio led his Northumbrians beyond the Tyne; the Danes retired to their ships, and sailed to the coast of Lindesey. To surprise the latter, William with his cavalry made a rapid march to the Humber. They were informed of his design, and crossed to the opposite coast of Holderness. But if the strangers eluded his approach in arms, they were accessible to money; and Sbern, the real leader of the expedition, is said to have sold his friendship to William for a considerable present. The report perhaps originated in the suspicions of a discontented people; but it is certain that from this period, the Danes, though they lingered for some months amidst the waters of the Humber, never attempted any enterprise of importance; and that Sbern, at his return to Denmark, was banished by his sovereign on the charge of cowardice or treachery.²

The transient gleam of success, which at first attended the arms of the confederates at York, had rekindled the hopes and the hostility of the natives. The flames of insurrection burst forth in every district which William left in his march to the north. Exeter was besieged by the people of Cornwall: the malcontents in Devon and Somersetshire made an assault upon Montacute; the men of Chester and a body of Welshmen, to whom were soon added Edric the Wild and his followers, took the town, and attempted to reduce the castle, of Shrewsbury. The inactivity of the Danes fortunately permitted him to retrace his steps. At Stafford he defeated a considerable body of insurgents; and Edric, hearing of his approach, set fire to Shrewsbury, and retired towards Wales. Exeter held out till the arrival of Fitz-Osbern and Brian to its relief; and in several other counties tranquillity was at last restored by the exertions of the royal lieutenants. The sufferings of both parties in this desultory warfare were severe; the troops in their marches and counter-marches pillaged the defenceless inhabitants without distinction of friend or foe; and the interruption of agricultural pursuits was followed by an alarming scarcity during the ensuing years. From Nottingham the king turned once more towards the north. At Pontefract he was detained for three weeks by the swell of the river Aire: a ford was at last discovered; he reached York, and ordered it to be carried by assault. Though Waltheof defended the city with obstinacy; though he slew with his own hands several Normans, as they rushed in through the gateway, he was compelled to abandon it to the conqueror, who immediately repaired the castles and appointed garrisons for their defence. Still the natives flattered themselves that the winter would compel him to return into the south: to their disappointment he sent for his crown from Winchester, and during the Christmas kept his court with the usual festivities at York.¹

¹ Orderic, 221—223. Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1068. Alur. Bev. 128.

² Orderic, 223. Malm. 60.

Elated with victory, and unrestrained by the motives of religion, or the feelings of humanity, William on this occasion devised and executed a system of revenge which has covered his name with everlasting infamy. As his former attempts to enforce obedience had failed, he now resolved to exterminate the refractory natives, and to place a wilderness as a barrier between his Normans and their implacable enemies. With this view he led his retainers from York; dispersed them in small divisions over the country; and gave them orders to spare neither man nor beast, but to destroy the houses, corn, implements of husbandry, and whatever might be useful or necessary to the support of human life. The work of plunder, slaughter, and conflagration commenced on the left bank of the Ouse, and successively reached the Tees, the Were, and the Tyne. The more distant inhabitants crossed over the last river: the citizens of Durham, mindful of the fate of Cumin, did not believe themselves safe, till they were settled in Holy Island, the property of their bishop. But thousands, whose flight was intercepted, concealed themselves in the forests, or made their way to the mountains, where they perished by hunger or disease. The number of men, women, and children, who fell victims to this barbarous policy, is said to have exceeded one hundred thousand. For nine years not a patch of cultivated ground could be seen between York and Durham; and at the distance of a century, eye-witnesses assure us that the country was strewed with ruins, the extent and number of which still attested the implacable resentment of the conqueror.²

The English chieftains, terrified by this severe infliction, abandoned the contest. Edgar, with the bishop of Durham, and his principal associates, sailed from Wearmouth to Scotland; Cospatric by messengers solicited and obtained his pardon and earldom; Waltheof, who by his valour had excited the admiration, and merited the esteem of the Normans, visited the king on the banks of the Tees, received from him the hand of his niece Judith in marriage, and recovered his former honours, the earldoms of Northampton and Huntingdon.³ From the Tees, William, on what account we are not informed, returned by a road, which had never been trodden by an armed force. It was in the heart of winter; a deep snow covered the ground; and the rivers, mountains, and ravines continually presented new and unexpected obstacles. In the general confusion, order and discipline disappeared; even the king himself wandered from the track, and passed an anxious night in entire ignorance, both of the place where he was himself, and of the route which the army had taken. After surmounting numerous difficulties, and suffering the severest privations, the men

¹ Orderic, 223—225. Malm. 56.

² Orderic, 226. Malm. 56. Simeon, 199. Alur. Rev. 128, 129. I may add the observation of the first writer: In multis Guillelmi nostri libenter extulit relictis: sed in hoc laudare non audeo . . . misericordia motus, miserabilis populi mororibus et anxietatibus magis condoleo, quam frivolis adulationibus inutiliter studeo. Præterea

indubitanter assero, quod impune non remittetur tam feralis occisio. Summos enim et imos infuatur omnipotens Juxta, æque omnium facta discutiet, et punit districtissimus vindex.—Ibid.

³ Judith was the daughter of the countess of Albemarle, William's uterine sister.—Will. Gemet. viii. 37.

reached York; most of the horses had perished in the snow.¹

This adventure might have checked the ardour of a less resolute leader; but the conqueror professed a sovereign contempt of hardships; and within a few weeks undertook a longer and more perilous expedition. In the beginning of March, amid storms of snow, sleet, and hail, he led his army from York to Chester, over the mountains which divide the two coasts of the island. The foreign mercenaries began to murmur; at length they burst into open mutiny, and clamorously demanded their discharge. "Let them go, if they please," answered the king, with apparent indifference, "I do not want their services." At the head of the army, and frequently on foot, he gave the example to his followers, who were ashamed not to equal the exertions and alacrity of their prince. At Chester he built a castle, pacified the country, and received Edric the Wild into favour. Thence he proceeded to Salisbury, where he rewarded, and disbanded the army. The only punishment inflicted on the mutineers was, that they were compelled to serve forty days longer than their fellows.²

The departure of the Normans did not put an end to the calamities of the northern counties. While the natives opposed William, Malcolm of Scotland considered them as friends; the moment they submitted, he became their enemy. Passing through Cumbria, he poured his barbarians into the north of Yorkshire, to glean whatever had escaped the rapacity of the Normans. Cospatric, who watched his motions, retaliated by a similar inroad into Cumbria, and returned with a plentiful harvest of plunder to his castle of Bamborough. Malcolm had marched from Cleveland, along the coast as far as Wearmouth, when he received the intelligence. From that moment the war assumed a more sanguinary aspect. The Scots, who were impelled not only by the hope of plunder but also by the thirst of revenge, crossed the Tyne, burnt the churches and villages; massacred the infants and the aged, and forced along with them all the men and women able to bear the fatigue of the journey. So numerous were the captives, that according to a writer, who was almost a contemporary, they furnished every farm in the south of Scotland with English slaves. When Malcolm had terminated this expedition, he offered his hand to Margaret, the sister of Edgar. The princess, who was in her twenty-second year, turned with disgust from a husband covered with the blood of so many innocent victims. She pleaded an inclination to embrace a conventual life; but her objections were overruled by the authority of Edgar and his counsellors; and the mild virtues of the wife insensibly softened the ferocity, and informed the mind, of her husband.³

William was now undisputed master

¹ Orderic, 226. In the text of this writer Hexham has inadvertently been admitted instead of York. It is evident that the latter is the true reading.

² Orderic, 227—231. Simeon, 202.

³ Simeon, 20. Flor. 636. Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1067. Alur. Bev. 130, 131. Vit. S. Marg. in Vit. SS. Scotie, ed. Pink. Of their eight children, three were kings of Scotland, one was queen, and one mother to a queen of England.

* Malcolm = Margaret.

Edgar.	Alexander.	David.	Matilda, to Henry I.	Mary, to Eustace of Boulogne.
--------	------------	--------	-------------------------	-------------------------------------

of England. From the Channel to the borders of Scotland his authority was universally acknowledged; in every county, with the exception of Cospatric's government, it was enforced by the presence of a powerful body of troops. In each populous burgh a strong fortress had been erected;¹ in case of insurrection, the Normans found an asylum within its walls; and the same place confined the principal natives of the district, as hostages for the obedience of their countrymen.² It was no longer necessary for the king to court popularity. He made it the principal object of his government to depress the natives, and to exalt the foreigners; and within a few years every dignity in the church, every place of emolument or authority in the state, and almost all the property in the land, had passed into the possession of Normans. From the commencement of the invasion the English had been accustomed to deposit in the monasteries their most valuable effects. They vainly hoped that these sanctuaries would be respected by men who professed the same religion; but on his return from the north William confiscated the whole, under the pretext that it belonged to his enemies. The royal commissioners carried off not only the plate and jewels, but, what was felt still more severely, the charters of immunities and evidences of property; and not only these, but also, in many instances, the treasures of the monasteries themselves, their sacred vessels, and the ornaments of their churches.³

At the king's request Pope Alexander had sent three legates to England: Ermenfrid, bishop of Sion, and the cardinals Peter and John. Ermenfrid was no stranger to the country. He had visited in the same capacity the court of Edward the Confessor.⁴ The purport of their commission was the reformation of the English clergy; the object of the king was to remove from situations of influence the native bishops and abbots. Councils were held at Winchester and Windsor. Stigand, who had attempted to annex the see of Winchester to that of Canterbury, and had been suspended for many years from his functions, was deposed;⁵ two or three other prelates were justly deprived of their churches on account of their immorality; and several experienced the same fate for no other crime than that of being Englishmen. Wulstan, the celebrated bishop of Worcester, was not molested, a favour, which probably he owed less to his unblemished character, than to the protection of Ermenfrid, whose friend and host he had been on a former occasion.⁶ By the Norman writers that legate is applauded as the inflexible main-

¹ The erection of the following castles is mentioned by ancient writers: of Pevensey, Hastings, and London, and the reparation of that of Dover, in 1066; of Winchester in 1067; of Chichester, Arundel, Exeter, Warwick, Nottingham, York, Lincoln, Huntingdon, and Cambridge, in 1068; of a second at York, one at Chester, and another at Stafford, in 1070.—See Orderic Vit. edit. Mæssenes, p. 228, note.

² This fact, sufficiently probable in itself, is confirmed by the History of Eufrot, in Simeon (206), and Hoveden (261).

³ Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1070. Simeon, 200. West. 226. Matt. Paris, 5.

⁴ Flor. 631. Ang. Sac. ii. 260. It is singular that Hume should describe Ermenfrid on this occasion as the first legate who had ever appeared in England, when, besides some other instances in the Anglo-Saxon times, that prelate himself had many years before come to England in the same capacity.

⁵ Stigand is said by Malmesbury (De Pont. 116) to have been treated with great severity; but his account is refuted by Rudborne, who informs us that the deposed primate was confined at large within the castle of Winchester, and permitted to take with him all his treasures. These at his death fell into the hands of the king, who presented a small portion to the church of that city.—Ang. Sac. i. 550.

⁶ Ang. Sac. ii. 250.

tainer of ecclesiastical discipline; by the English he is censured as an obsequious minister to the royal pleasure.

Nor was this system of proscription confined to the bishops. In the succeeding years it gradually descended to inferior stations in the church, till hardly a single native remained in possession of influence or wealth. Of their successors many were needy and rapacious foreigners, indebted for their promotion not to their own merit, but to the favour or gratitude of their patrons:¹ but to the praise of William it should be observed that, with one or two exceptions, he admitted none to the higher ecclesiastical dignities, who were not distinguished by their talents and virtues.² On the whole, this change of hierarchy, though accompanied with many acts of injustice, was a national benefit. It served to awaken the English clergy from that state of intellectual torpor in which they had so long slumbered, and to raise them gradually to a level with their foreign brothers in point of mental cultivation. The new bishops introduced a stricter discipline, excited a thirst for learning, and expended the wealth which they acquired in works of public magnificence, or of public charity.

The most illustrious of the number, both in abilities and his station, was Lanfranc, a native of Pavia, and during many years professor of laws in that city. From Pavia he travelled into Normandy, opened a school at Avranches, and diffused a taste for knowledge among the clergy. In 1042, motives of piety induced him to withdraw from the applause of the public, and to sequester himself in the poor and lonely abbey of Bec. But talents like his could not be long hidden in obscurity: the commands of the abbot Herluin compelled him to resume the office of teaching; and more than a hundred scholars attended his lectures. In 1063 William made him abbot of the monastery of St. Stephen, which he had lately founded at Caen; and in 1070 appointed him, with the assent of his barons, to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury. Lanfranc objected his ignorance of the language and the manners of the barbarians; nor was his acquiescence obtained without the united solicitations of the legate, the queen Matilda, and the abbot Herluin. The new archbishop was constantly respected by the king and his successor; and he frequently employed the influence which he possessed, in the support of justice, and the protection of the natives. To his firmness and perseverance the church of Canterbury owed a great part of her possessions, which he wrested from the tenacious grasp of the conquerors.³ He rebuilt the cathedral, which had been destroyed by fire; repaired in many places the devastations occasioned by the war, and founded, without the walls of the city, two opulent hospitals, one for lepers, the other for the infirm. At his death in 1079, he was nearly one hundred years of age.⁴

The monk Guitmond, the celebrated disciple of Lanfranc, refused to imitate the conduct of his master. When he was solicited by William to accept an English bishopric, he boldly replied, that after having spontaneously abandoned wealth and distinction, he would never receive them again from those who pretended to give what was

¹ Orderic, 262—264.

² Id. 233.

³ While Stigand was in disgrace, Odo had taken possession of many of the manors belonging to the archbishopric. At Lanfranc's request a shire-mote was held at Pinnenden, in which Geoffrey, bishop of Coutances, presided by order of William. After a hearing of three days, the lands in question were adjudged to the church.—See the proceedings in Selden's Spicilegium ad Eadm. p. 197. With equal success the archbishop contended for the superiority of his see over that of York, against Thomas, lately promoted to the latter.—Malm. 112—117.

⁴ Orderic, 241—245. Malm. 117, 118.

not their own; and that, if the chance of war had placed the crown on the head of William to the prejudice of the legitimate heir, it still could not authorize him to impose on the English ecclesiastical superiors against their will. The freedom of this answer displeased the barons; and when the king offered him the archbishopric of Rouen, they not only prevented his promotion, but expelled him from Normandy. He sought an asylum in the papal court, and died archbishop of Aversa, in Italy.¹

Among those who were thus promoted by the partiality of the conqueror, I may mention another individual, whose authority has been frequently adduced in these pages. Ingulf was an Englishman born in London, and studied first at Westminster, afterwards perhaps at Oxford.² When William visited Edward the Confessor, Ingulf attached himself to the service of the duke, and was employed by him as his secretary. From Normandy he travelled a pilgrim to Jerusalem, returned, and received the monastic habit at Fontanelles. It chanced that Wulfketul, abbot of Croyland, was deposed and imprisoned at the instance of Ivo Taillebois. The king bestowed the abbey upon his former secretary. But though Ingulf was indebted to foreigners for his promotion, he always retained the heart of an Englishman. He firmly resisted the pretensions of the Normans in his neighbourhood, obtained several indulgences for his predecessor, and to soothe the feelings of the old man, always assumed the modest title of his vicergerent. He has left us a detailed account of the abbey of Croyland from its foundation; and has interwoven in his narrative many interesting particulars of national history.³

In 1071, the embers of civil war were rekindled by the jealousy of William. During the late disturbances Edwin and Morcar had cautiously abstained from any communication with the insurgents. But if their conduct was unexceptionable, their influence was judged dangerous. In them the natives beheld the present hope, and the future liberators of their country; and the king judged it expedient to allay his own apprehensions by securing their persons. The attempt was made in vain. Edwin concealed himself; solicited aid from the friends of his family; and eluding the vigilance of the Normans, endeavoured to escape towards the borders of Scotland. Unfortunately, the secret of his route was betrayed by three of his vassals; the temporary swell of a rivulet from the influx of the tide intercepted his flight; and he fell, with twenty of his faithful adherents, fighting against his pursuers. The traitors presented his head to William, who rewarded their services with a sentence of perpetual banishment. The

¹ Orderic, 264—270.

² Primum Westmonasterio, postmodum Oxoniensi studio traditus eram. Cumque in Aristotele arripiendo profecissem, &c.—Ingulf, 73. Gibbon doubted the authenticity of this passage, because Oxford was in ruins in 1046, and the works of Aristotle were then unknown.—Posthumous Works, iii. 534: That the History of Ingulf could not have come from his pen in the state in which we have it now, is plain.—See Quarterly Rev. xxiv. 289. The original must have been adulterated with the interpolations of some later writer; and therefore I have seldom recourse to the testimony of Ingulf, unless it is strengthened by other authority. That this passage is an interpolation, is not improbable; yet the arguments of Gibbon are far from conclusive. For, 1st, it was in 1010 that Oxford was burnt. Three years after it rose from its ashes, and became a place of importance.—See the Saxon Chronicle, p. 139, 143, 146, 154, 155. 2nd, Aristotle was known more early than is generally thought. Alcuin, who wrote two centuries before Ingulf, informs us that Aristotle was studied at York (De Pont. Eborac. v. 1550), and wrote a treatise himself on the Isagoge, Categoriæ, Bylogismi, Topicæ, and Perihermenie.—Canis. ii. part i. p. 483. Alc. Opera, i. 47; ii. 380.

³ Ingulf, 73. Orderic, 343.

fate of his brother Morcar was different. He fled to the protection of Hereward, who had presumed to rear the banner of independence amidst the fens and morasses of Cambridgeshire.¹

The memory of Hereward was long dear to the people of England. The recital of his exploits gratified their vanity and resentment; and traditional songs transmitted his fame to succeeding generations. His father, the lord of Bourn, in Lincolnshire, unable to restrain the turbulence of his temper, had obtained an order for his banishment from Edward the Confessor; and the exile had earned in foreign countries the praise of a hardy and fearless warrior. He was in Flanders at the period of the conquest; but when he heard that his father was dead, and that his mother had been dispossessed of the lordship of Bourn by a foreigner, he returned in haste, collected the vassals of the family, and drove the Norman from his paternal estates. The fame of this exploit increased the number of his followers: every man anxious to avenge his own wrongs, or the wrongs of his country, hastened to the standard of Hereward; a fortress of wood was erected in the Isle of Ely for the protection of their treasures; and a small band of outlaws, instigated by revenge, and emboldened by despair, set at defiance the whole power of the conqueror.²

Hereward, with several of his followers, had received the sword of knighthood from his uncle Brand, abbot of Peterborough. Brand died before the close of the year 1069; and William gave the abbey to Turolde, a foreign monk, who, with a guard of one hundred and sixty horsemen, proceeded to take possession. He had already reached Stamford, when Hereward resolved to plunder the monastery. The Danes, who had passed the winter in the Humber, were now in the Wash, and Sbern, their leader, consented to join the outlaws. The town of Peterborough was burnt; the monks were dispersed; the treasures which they had concealed were discovered; and the abbey was given to the flames. Hereward retired to his asylum: Sbern sailed towards Denmark.³

To remove these importunate enemies, Turolde purchased the services of Ivo Taillebois, to whom the conqueror had given the district of Hoyalnd. Confident of success, the abbot and the Norman commenced the expedition with a numerous body of cavalry. But nothing could elude the vigilance of Hereward. As Taillebois entered one side of a thick wood, the chieftain issued from the other; darted unexpectedly upon Turolde; and carried him off with several other Normans, whom he confined in damp and unwholesome dungeons, till the sum of two thousand pounds had been paid for their ransom.⁴

For awhile the pride of William disdained to notice the efforts of Hereward; but when Morcar and most of the exiles from Scotland had joined that chieftain, prudence compelled him to crush the hydra, before it could grow to maturity. He stationed his fleet in the Wash, with orders to observe every outlet from the fens, to the ocean: by land he distributed his forces in such a manner as to render escape almost impossible. Still the great difficulty remained to reach the enemy, who had retired to their fortress, situated in an expanse of water which in the narrowest part was more than two miles in breadth. The king undertook to construct a solid road

¹ Orderic, 246. Ing. 70. Hunt. 211. Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1072. All ancient writers concur in the fact that Edwin and Morcar were persecuted by William; I have selected such circumstances as appear the most probable. ² Ingulf 47, 70, 71.

³ Ing. 70. Chron. Sax. 176, 177.

⁴ Pet. Blesens. p. 125.

across the marshes, and to throw bridges over the channels of the rivers, a work of considerable labour, and of equal danger, in the face of a vigilant and enterprising enemy. Hereward frequently dispersed the workmen; and his attacks were so sudden, so incessant, and so destructive, that the Normans attributed his success to the assistance of Satan. At the instigation of Tailbois, William had the weakness to employ a sorceress, who was expected, by the superior efficacy of her spells, to defeat those of the English magicians. She was placed in a wooden turret at the head of the work: but Hereward, who had watched his opportunity, set fire to the dry reeds in the neighbourhood; the wind rapidly spread the conflagration; and the enchantress with her guards, the turret with the workmen, were enveloped and consumed in the flames.¹

These checks might irritate the king: they could not divert him from his purpose. In defiance of every obstacle the work advanced; it was evident that in a few days the Normans would be in possession of the island; and the greater part of the outlaws voluntarily submitted to the royal mercy. Their fate was different. Of some he accepted the ransom, a few suffered death, many lost an eye, a hand, or a foot; and several, among whom were Morcar and the bishop of Durham, were condemned to perpetual imprisonment. Hereward alone could not brook the idea of submission. He escaped across the marshes, concealed himself in the woods, and as soon as the royal army had retired, resumed hostilities against the enemy. But the king, who had learnt to respect his valour, was not averse to a reconciliation. The chieftain took the oath of allegiance, and was permitted to enjoy in peace the patrimony of his ancestors.²

William was now at leisure to chastise the presumption of Malcolm, who had not only afforded an asylum to his enemies, but had seized every opportunity to enter the northern counties, exciting the natives to rebellion, and ravaging the lands of those who refused.³ With a determination to subdue the whole country, the king summoned to his standard all his retainers, both Norman and English; and while his fleet crept along the coast, directed his march through the Lothians. Opposition fled before him. He crossed the Forth; he entered "Scotland;" he penetrated to Abernethy on the Tay; and Malcolm thought it better to preserve his crown as a vassal, than to lose it by braving the resentment of his enemy. He made an offer of submission, the conditions of which were dictated by William; and the Scottish king, coming to the English camp, threw himself on the mercy of the conqueror. He was permitted to retain the government as a vassal of the English crown; and in that quality swore fealty, performed the ceremony of homage, and gave hostages for his fidelity.⁴ The king in his return halted

¹ Pet. Blesens. p. 125.

² For the siege of Ely see Ingulf, p. 74; Flor. 637; Sim. 208; Hunt. 211; Paris, 6; Chron. Sax. 181; Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1073. Some writers say that Morcar, like his brother, was killed by treachery; but the preponderance of authority is in favour of his imprisonment.—See also Orderic, p. 247, and Ing. 68.

³ From the Book of Abingdon, quoted by Sir F. Palgrave (Proofs and Illustrations, cccxxi.), there is some reason to believe, that when William wasted the country from the Ouse to the Tyne, he sent forward his son Robert with an army against Malcolm, who gave hostages for his submission. Uⁱ regno Angliæ principatus Sootie subactus foret, obaides dedit.

⁴ I am fully aware that several Scottish writers, anxious to save the honour of Malcolm, seek to persuade us that the Abernethy in question is some unknown place on the borders, not Abernethy on the Tay; that the two kings settled their differences in an amicable manner, and that the homage of Malcolm was not performed for Scotland, but for lands given to him in England. It is, however, impossible to elude the testi-at Durham, to erect a castle for the protection of Walcher, the new bishop, and summoned before his tribunal Cospatric, the earl of Northumberland. He was charged with old offences, which it was supposed had been long ago forgiven, the massacres of the Normans at Durham and York. Banished by the sentence of the court, Cospatric retired, after several adventures, to Malcolm, and received from the pity or policy of that prince the castle and demesnes of Dunbar. His earldom was bestowed on Waltheof, who took the first opportunity to revenge the murder of his grandfather Aldred.¹ He surprised and slew the sons of Carl, at a banquet in Seterington.²

Hereward was the last Englishman who had drawn the sword in the cause of independence. The natives submitted to the yoke in sullen despair; even Edgar the Etheling resigned the hope of revenge, and consented to solicit a livelihood from the mercy of the man whose ambition had robbed him of a crown. He was still in Scotland, when the king of France offered him a princely establishment at Montreuil, near the borders of Normandy; not that Philip cared for the misfor-tures of the etheling, but that he sought to annoy William, who had become his rival both in power and dignity. Edgar put to sea with the wealth which he had brought from England, and the presents which had been made to him by the king, queen, and nobles of Scotland. But his small squadron was dispersed by a tempest: his ships were stranded on the coast; his treasures and some of his followers were seized by the inhabitants; and the unfortunate prince returned to solicit once more the protection of his brother-in-law. By him he was advised to seek a reconciliation with William, who received the overture with pleasure. At Durham the sheriff of Yorkshire met him with a numerous escort, in appearance to do him honour, in reality to secure his person.³ Under this guard he traversed England, crossed the sea, and was presented to William in Normandy, who granted him the first place at court, an apartment in the palace, and a yearly pension of three hundred and sixty-five pounds of silver. For several years the last male descendant of Cerdic confined his ambition to the sports of the field; in 1086 he obtained permission to conduct two hundred mony of the original and contemporary historians. 1. The king's object was to conquer Scotland (ut eam sibi subjugaret.—Sim. 203. Flor. 637). 2. He advanced to Abernethy on the Tay ("He led ship-force and land-force to Scotland; and the land on the sea-half he beleaguered with ships, and led in his army at the ge-wade"—not the Tweed, as Gibson unaccountably translates it, but the "ford" or wading-place.—Chron. Sax. 181. This ford was over the Forth, the southern boundary of Scotland in that age. Thus Ethelred tells us that the king passed through Lothian, and some other place, and then through Scotland to Abernethy, Lacadam, Calatram—a word altered in copying—Scotium usque ad Abernethy.—Ethel. 342). 3. All opposition was fruitless. "He there found naught that him better was."—Chron. Sax. 181. This passage has been ridiculously explained to signify that he found nothing of service, neither provision nor riches: but the real meaning is that he found no man better than himself, that is, no man able to resist him with success, as Siward is said to have slain of his enemies "all that was best."—Chron. Lamb. ann. 1054. 4. At Abernethy Malcolm came and surrendered himself (deditione factus est noster.—Ethelred, 342. Se dedit.—Malm. 58). 5. Scotland was subdued (Scotiam sibi subiecit.—Ingulf, 79). Malcolm was obliged to do homage and swear fealty (Malcolmum regem ejus sibi hominum facere, et fidelitatem jurare coegit.—Ing. ibid.); and in addition to give hostages for his fidelity (obsides, Sim. 203; Gialas sealde, and his man was, Chron. Sax. 181). It should be observed, that of these writers the Saxon annalist had lived in William's court, Ingulf had been his secretary, Ethelred was the intimate acquaintance of David, the son of Malcolm, and the rest lived in the next century. They could not all be mistaken.

¹ See p. 153, note.

² Alur. Bev. 132. Sim. 203, 204.

³ Malm. 68. Hoved. 244.

knight to Apulia, and from Apulia to the Holy Land. We shall meet him again in England during the reign of William Rufus.¹

We may now pause to contemplate the consequences of this mighty revolution. The conqueror was undisputed master of the kingdom; opposition had melted away before him; and with the new dynasty had arisen a new system of national polity, erected on the ruins of the old. I. England presented the singular spectacle of a native population with a foreign sovereign, a foreign hierarchy, and a foreign nobility. The king was a Norman; the bishops and principal abbots, with the exception of Wulstan and Ingulf, were Normans; and, after the death of Waltheof, every earl, and every powerful vassal of the crown, was a Norman. Each of these, to guard against the disaffection of the natives, naturally surrounded himself with foreigners, who alone were the objects of his favour and patronage; and thus almost all, who aspired to the rank of gentlemen, all who possessed either wealth or authority, were also Normans. Individuals who in their own country had been poor and unknown, saw themselves unexpectedly elevated in the scale of society; they were astonished at their own good fortune; and generally displayed in their conduct all the arrogance of newly acquired power. Contempt and oppression became the portion of the natives, whose farms were pillaged, females violated, and persons imprisoned at the caprice of these petty and local tyrants.² "I will not undertake," says an ancient writer, "to describe the misery of this wretched people. It would be a painful task to me; and the account would be disbelieved by posterity."³

The first donations which the king made to his followers, were taken either out of the demesne lands of the crown, or the estates of the natives who either had fallen in battle, or after the victory had refused to submit to the conqueror. The rest by taking the oath of allegiance to the new sovereign, secured to themselves the present possession of their property. But most of these engaged in some or other of the rebellions which followed; the violation of their fealty subjected them by law to the forfeiture of their estates; and new grants were made to reward the services of new adventurers. Nor were the grantees always satisfied with the king's bounty. Their arrogance trampled on the rights of the natives; and their rapacity dispossessed their innocent but unprotected neighbours. The sufferers occasionally appealed to the equity of the king; but he was not eager to displease the men on whose swords he depended for the possession of his crown: and, if he ordered the restitution of the property which had been unjustly invaded, he seldom cared to enforce the execution of the decree which he had made. Harassed, however, by the importunate complaints of the English on the one hand, and the intractable rapacity of the Normans on the other, he commanded both parties to settle their disputes by compromise. The expedient relieved him from the performance of an office, in which his duty was opposed to his interests; but it uniformly turned to the advantage of the oppressors. The Englishman was compelled to surrender the greater portion of his estate, that he might retain the remainder, not as the real proprietor, but as the vassal of the man by whom he had been wronged.⁴

II. Thus, partly by grant and partly

¹ Chron. Lamb. ad ann. 1075.

² Ex infimis Normannorum clientibus tribunos et centuriones ditissimos erexit.—

Orderic, 250; 253, 254, 255, 257, 259—263. Radmer, 57. Hunt, 712.

³ Hist. Ellen. 616.

⁴ Compare the words of Gervase of Til-by usurpation, almost all the lands in the kingdom were transferred to the possession of Normans. The families which, under the Anglo-Saxon dynasty, had been distinguished by their opulence and power, successively disappeared. Many perished in the different insurrections; others begged their bread in exile,¹ or languished in prison, or dragged on a precarious existence under the protection of their new lords. The king himself was become the principal proprietor in the kingdom. The royal demesnes had fallen to his share; and if these in some instances had been diminished by grants to his followers, the loss had been amply repaired from the forfeited estates of the English thanes. He possessed no fewer than one thousand four hundred and thirty-two manors in different parts of the kingdom.² The next to him was his brother Odo, distinguished by the title of the earl bishop, who held almost two hundred manors in Kent, and two hundred and fifty in other counties. Another prelate, highly esteemed, and as liberally rewarded by the conqueror, Geoffrey, bishop of Coutances, left at his death two hundred and eighty manors to Roger Mowbray, his nephew. Robert, count of Mortaigne, the brother of William and Odo, obtained for his share nine hundred and seventy-three manors; four hundred and forty-two fell to the portion of Alan Fergant, earl of Bretagne; two hundred and ninety-eight to that of William Warrene; and one hundred and seventy-one to Richard de Clare. Other estates in greater or smaller proportions were bestowed on the rest of the foreign chieftains, according to the caprice or the gratitude of the new sovereign.³

In addition to the grant of lands, he conferred on his principal favourites another distinction honourable in itself, profitable to the possessors, and necessary for the stability of the Norman power. This was the earldom, or command of the several counties. Odo was created earl of Kent, and Hugh of Avranches earl of Chester, with royal jurisdiction within their respective earldoms. Fitz-Osbern obtained the earldom of Hereford, Roger Montgomery that of Shropshire, Walter Giffard that of Buckingham, Alan of Bretagne that of Richmond, and Ralph Guader that of Norfolk. In the Saxon times such dignities were usually granted for life; William made them hereditary in the same family.⁴

bury (Brad. i. 15), with the correct extract from the MS. of the Sharnburn family, apud Wilk. Leg. Sax. 287.

¹ Of one body of these exiles we meet with memorials in the history of the Eastern empire. A collection of Anglo-Saxon ships passed the Pillars of Hercules, sailed up the Mediterranean, and offered their services to the Grecian emperor, from whom they received lands at Chevetot, beyond the strait. From that time they bore arms under the banner of their protector, Alexis Comnenus, against his and their common enemy, the Normans. For, as William with his Normans had driven them from England, so Robert the Guiscard, with his Norman adventurers, threatened to wrest the northern provinces of Greece from the sovereignty of Alexis. The exiles fought with him in every battle, from the siege of Durazzo, to the final retreat of the enemy from the walls of Larissa. At Castorio they lost three hundred men. To the survivors the emperor gave, for their residence one of his palaces at Constantinople; they and their posterity for many generations served in the imperial guard; and at the fall of the city in the thirteenth century, the Inglot, armed with the battle-axes of their fathers, formed, together with a body of Danes, the principal force which the successor of Angustinus brought to oppose the torrent of the Crusaders.—Orderic, 364. Anna Comnena, Alex. v. Villehardouin, lxxix.

² Manor (a Manendo, Orderic, 255) was synonymous in the language of the Normans with villa in Latin, and Tune in English. It denoted an extensive parcel of land, with a house on it for the accommodation of the lord, and cottages for his villeins and slaves. He generally kept a part in his own hands, and bestowed the remainder on two or more tenants, who held of him by military service, or rent, or other prestations.

³ Orderic, 250, 255.

⁴ The earls, besides their estates in the

It should, however, be observed that the Norman nobles were as prodigal as they were rapacious. Their vanity was flattered by the number and wealth of their retainers, whose services they purchased and required with the most liberal donations. Hence the estates which they received from the king, they doled out to their followers in such proportions, and on such conditions, as were reciprocally stipulated. Of all his manors in Kent, the earl bishop did not retain more than a dozen in his own possession.¹ Fitz-Osbern was always in want; whatever he obtained, he gave away; and the king himself repeatedly chided him for his thoughtlessness and prodigality.² Hugh of Avranches was surrounded by an army of knights, his retainers, who accompanied him wherever he went, pillaging the farms as they passed, and living at the expense of the people.³ Thus it happened that not only the immediate vassals of the crown but the chief of their sub-vassals were also foreigners; and the natives who were permitted to retain the possession of land, gradually sank into the lowest classes of freemen.

III. So general and so rapid a transfer of property from one people to another could not be effected without producing important alterations in the condition of the tenures by which lands had been hitherto held. Of these tenures that by military service was esteemed the most honourable. In the preceding pages the reader will have noticed the rudiments of military tenures among the Anglo-Saxons; he will soon discover them under the Normans improved into a much more perfect, but also more onerous system. Whether the institution of knights' fees was originally devised, or only introduced by the policy of the conqueror, may perhaps be doubted. It is indeed generally supposed that he brought it with him from Normandy, where it certainly prevailed under his successors; but I am ignorant of any ancient authority by which its existence on a large scale can be proved either in that or any other country, previous to its establishment in this island. William saw that as his crown had been won, so it could be preserved, only by the sword. The unceasing hostility of the natives must have suggested the expediency of providing a force, which might at all moments be prepared to crush the rebellious, and overawe the disaffected; nor was it easy to imagine a plan better calculated for the purpose than that which compelled each tenant in chief to have a certain number of knights or horsemen always ready to fight under his banner, and to obey the commands of the sovereign. From the laws of the conqueror we may infer that this subject was discussed and determined in a great council of his vassals at London. "We will," says he, "that all the freemen of the kingdom possess their lands in peace, free from all tallage and unjust exaction; that nothing be required or taken from them but their free service which they owe to us of right, as has been appointed to them, and granted by us with hereditary right for ever by the common council of our whole kingdom." "And we command that all earls, barons, knights, serjeants, and freemen be always provided with horses and arms as they ought, and that they be always ready to perform county, derived other profits from their earldoms, particularly the third penny or what was due to the king from proceedings at law. Warene, from his earldom of Surrey, received annually 1,000 pounds (Orderic, inter Scrip. Norm. 804); but in this sum must be included the profits arising from his lands.

¹ Domesday, Chent.

² Malm. 59.

³ Orderic, 253.

to us their whole service, in manner as they owe it to us of right for their fees and tenements, and as we have appointed to them by the common council of our whole kingdom, and as we have granted to them in fee with right of inheritance.¹ This free service which was so strongly enforced, consisted, as we learn from other sources, in the quota of horsemen completely armed, which each vassal was bound to furnish at the king's requisition, and to maintain in the field during the space of forty days. Nor was it confined solely to the lay tenants. The bishops and dignified ecclesiastics, with most of the clerical and monastic bodies, were compelled to submit to the same burthen. A few exemptions were indeed granted to those who could prove that they held their lands in francalmoigne or free alms; but the others, whose predecessors had been accustomed to furnish men to the armies during the invasions of the Danes, could not refuse to grant a similar aid to the present sovereign, to whom they owed their dignities and opulence. This regulation enabled the crown at a short notice to raise an army of cavalry, which is said to have amounted to sixty thousand men.²

The tenants in chief imitated the sovereign in exacting from their retainers the same free service which the king exacted from them. Thus every large property, whether it were held by a vassal of the crown, or a sub-vassal, became divided into two portions of unequal extent. One the lord reserved for his own use under the name of his demesne, cultivated part of it by his villeins, let out parts to farm, and gave parts to different tenants to be holden by any other than military service.³ The second portion he divided into parcels called knights' fees, and bestowed on military tenants, with the obligation of serving on horseback at his requisition during the usual period.⁴ But in these sub-feudations each mesne lord was guided solely by his own judgment or caprice. The number of knights' fees established by some was greater, of those established by others was smaller, than the number of knights whom they were bound to furnish by their tenures. Thus the bishop of Durham and Roger de Burun owed the crown the same service of ten knights; but the former had enfeoffed no fewer than seventy, the latter only six. The consequence was, that the prelate had always more than sufficient to perform his service, while Roger was compelled to supply his deficiency with hired substitutes, or

¹ Wilk. Leg. 217, 228.

² Order. 258. In a passage in Sprot, which is evidently mutilated, the number of knights' fees is fixed at 80,215, of which 28,015 are said to have belonged to the monks alone, independently of the rest of the clergy.—Sprot, Chron. 114. Hence it has been inferred that they possessed almost one-half of the landed property in the kingdom. But it is evident that there exists some error in the number. From the returns in the Liber Niger Scocarii under Henry II., it appears that the number of knights' fees belonging to the monasteries was comparatively trifling; and, if the monks had really been compelled to give away to laymen the immense quantity of land necessary to constitute 28,015 knights' fees, we should certainly meet with complaints on the subject in some of their writers. I do not believe that one of them has ever so much as alluded to it.

³ Some lands were held in villenage even by freemen, who bound themselves to render such services as were usually rendered by villeins: others were held in soccage, that is, by rent or any other free but conventional service, with the obligation of suit to the court of the lord. Burgage tenure was confined to the towns, and was frequently different even in the same town, according to the original will of the lord.

⁴ Thus the obligation of military service was ultimately laid on the smaller portion of the land. The estates belonging to the abbey of Ramsay contained 380 hides.—See the fragment printed after Sprot, p. 188—197. Yet the quantity of land which had been converted into knights' fees did not exceed 60.—Ib. p. 215—217. Lib. Nig. i. 266.

the voluntary attendance of some of the freeholders on his demesne.¹

But besides military service these tenures imposed on the vassal a number of obligations and burthens, without the knowledge of which it would be impossible to understand the nature of the transactions to be recorded in the following pages.

1. Fealty was incident to every, even the lowest, species of tenure.² Besides fealty the military tenant was obliged to do homage that he might obtain the investiture of his fee. Unarmed and bareheaded, on his knees, and with his hands placed between those of his lord, he repeated these words: "Hear, my lord; I become your liege man of life, and limb, and earthly worship; and faith and truth I will bear to you to live and die. So help me God." The ceremony was concluded with a kiss; and the man was thenceforth bound to respect and obey his lord; the lord to protect his man, and to warrant to him the possession of his fee.³ Hitherto in other countries the royal authority could only reach the sub-vassals through their lord, who alone had sworn fealty to the sovereign: nor did they deem themselves deserving of punishment, if they assisted him in his wars, or in his rebellion against the crown. Such the law remained for a long period on the continent; but William, who had experienced its inconvenience, devised a remedy in England; and compelled all the free tenants of his immediate vassals to swear fealty to himself.⁴ The consequence was an alteration in the words of the oath: the king's own tenant swore to be true to him against all manner of men; sub-tenants swore to be true to their lords against all men but the king and his heirs. Hence, if they followed their lord in his rebellion, they were adjudged to have violated their allegiance, and became subject to the same penalties as their leader.

2. In addition to service in the time of war, the military tenants of the crown were expected to attend the king's court at the three great festivals; and, unless they could show a reasonable cause of absence, were bound to appear on other occasions, whenever they were summoned. But if this in some respects was a burthen, in others it was an honour and an advantage. In these assemblies they consulted together on all matters concerning the welfare or the safety of the state, concurred with the

¹ Lib. Nig. Scac. i. 204, 306. The quantity of land constituting a knight's fee was regulated by the custom of the manor; whence it differed in different manors, probably according to the arrangement made by the original tenant in capite. Some knights' fees contained five carucates of land, others six, or ten, sixteen, eighteen, twenty-seven, or forty-eight.—Lib. Nig. 278. Abbev. Plac. 59, 73, 237, 289. We meet with such variations even in different villis in the same locality. Twelve carucates and a half made a knight's fee in Plimpton, twenty in Scotton, ten in Ribstane, all in the vicinity of Scarborough.—See the deed of Nigel Plimpton in the Plimpton Correspondence, p. 14. Nor was the customary quantity always adhered to in agreements between the lord and his vassals. Richard de Hein in the return of his knights to Henry II. says: Quingne carucates facient unum militem, et milites tenent eos, quidem plus, quidem minus.—Lib. Nig. i. 278.

² Even the villein took an oath of fealty to his lord for the cottage and land which he enjoyed from his bounty, and promised to submit to his jurisdiction both as to body and chattels.—Spelm. Arch. 226. But this oath of fealty became in the lapse of ages the cause of great improvement in the condition of villeins. It entitled them to some consideration from their lords. Their serments were suffered to descend to their children, who took the same oath, and performed the same services; and the land continued in the same family for so many generations, that the villein at length was deemed to have obtained a legal interest in it. Thus it is supposed that tenure by copyhold was established.

³ Spelm. Arch. 236. Glan. ix. 1. Ex parte domini protectio, defensio, warrantia; ex parte tenentis reverentia et subiectio.—Bract. ii. 25.

⁴ Chron. Sax. 137. Alur. Rev. 136.

sovereign in making or amending the laws, and formed the highest judicial tribunal in the kingdom. Hence they acquired the appellation of the king's barons; the collective body was called the baronage of England; and the lands which they held of the crown were termed their respective baronies. By degrees, however, many of the smaller baronies became divided and subdivided by marriages and descents; and the poverty of the possessors induced them to excludé themselves from the assemblies of their colleagues. In the reign of John the distinction was established between the lesser and the greater barons; and as the latter only continued to exercise the privileges, they alone after some time were known by the title of barons.¹

¹ I am aware that in the opinion of some respectable antiquaries, a barony consisted of 13 knights' fees and one-third. But their opinion rests on no ancient authority, and is merely an inference drawn from Magna Charta, which makes the relief of a barony equal to the reliefs of 13½ knights' fees. But the distinction of greater and lesser barons was then established; and the former, harassed with arbitrary reliefs (Glanville, ix. 4), had insisted that a certain sum should be fixed by law. If this prove that a barony consisted of 13½ knights' fees, the same reasoning will prove that an earldom consisted of twenty, which is certainly false. I may observe, 1. That our ancient writers frequently comprise all the tenants of the crown under the name of barons. 2. That in the Dialogus de Scaccario, their fees are divided into lesser and greater baronies (l. ii. c. 9). 3. That in the Liber Niger Scaccarii fee and barony are used synonymously: and some baronies are held by the service of thirty or forty knights, others by that of three or four. I will mention one instance, which proves both. Thus in the time of Henry I. Nicholas de Granville held his barony in Northumberland by the service of three knights. His successor William left only two daughters, who divided the barony between them. To the questions put from the king, Hugh of Killington, who married one of the sisters, answers that he holds half of the barony by the service of one knight and a half; and Ralph de Gaugi, the son of the other sister, that he holds half of the fee by the service of one knight and a half.—Lib. Nig. 332, 338. 4. In the Constitutions of Clarendon under

3. According to a specious, but perhaps erroneous theory, fees are beneficiary grants of land, which originally depended for their duration on the pleasure of the lord, but were gradually improved into estates for life, and at last converted into estates of inheritance. But whatever might have been the practice in former ages, the fees created by William and his followers were all granted in perpetuity, to the feeoffees and their legitimate descendants. There were, however, two cases in which they might escheat or fall to the lord: when by failure of heirs the race of the first tenant had become extinct;² or by felony or treason the actual tenant incurred the penalty of forfeiture.³ On this account an officer was appointed by the crown

Henry II. it is determined that all bishops and parsons holding of the king in chief, hold in barony, and are bound to attend the king's court like other barons.—Leg. Sax. 384. Hence it may be fairly inferred that laymen holding in chief, originally at least, held also in barony. 5. In the 14th of Edward II. a petition with respect to scutage was presented by "the prelates, earls, barons, and others," stating "that the archbishops, bishops, prelates, earls, and barons, and other great lords of the land, held their baronies, lands, tenements, and honours in chief of the king by certain services, some by three knights' fees, and others by four, some by more and some by less, according to the ancient feoffments, and the quantity of their tenure, of which services the king and his ancestors have been seized by the hands of the aforesaid archbishops, prelates, earls, and barons," &c. From the whole document it appears that, as the ecclesiastical tenants are sometimes distinguished from each other, and sometimes comprehended under the general designation of prelates; so the lesser tenants in chief are sometimes distinguished from the earls and barons, and sometimes comprehended with them under the general title of barons.—Rot. Parl. i. 383, 384.

² Glanv. vii. 17.

³ Failure in military service was forbidden by the Conqueror under the penalty of "full forfeiture."—Leg. 317, 328. Canute had before enacted that if a vassal fled from his lord in an expedition, he should forfeit to the lord whatever he held of him, and to the king his other estates.—Leg. 145.

in every county to watch over its rights, and to take immediate possession of all escheated estates.

4. When the heir, being of full age, entered into possession of the fee, he was required to pay a certain sum to the lord under the name of heriot among the Saxons, of relief among the Normans. By modern feudalists we are told that this was meant as an acknowledgment, that the fee was held from the bounty of the lord; but it may be fairly doubted whether their doctrine have any foundation in fact. Originally the heriot was demanded as due not from the new, but from the last tenant, and was discharged out of his personal estate;¹ he generally made provisions for the payment in his will; and it often appears in the form of a legacy, by which the vassal sought to testify his respect for the person, and his gratitude for the protection, of his lord.² By Canute the amount of the heriot was regulated by the rank of each tenant: by William that amount was considerably diminished. When he confirmed the law of Canute, he entirely omitted the demand of money, and contented himself with a portion of the horses and arms, the hounds and hawks of the deceased.³ But the new regulation was soon violated; avarice again introduced pecuniary reliefs; and the enormous sums which were exacted by succeeding kings, became the frequent subject of useless complaint and ineffectual reform.

5. The Conqueror had solemnly pledged his word that he would never require more from his vassals than their stipulated services. But the ingenuity of the feudal lawyers discovered that there were four occasions on which the lord had a right to levy of his own authority a pecuniary aid on his tenants: when he paid the relief of his fee, when he made his eldest son a knight, when he gave his eldest daughter in marriage, and when he had the misfortune to be a captive in the hands of his enemies.⁴ Of these cases the first could not apply to the tenants of the crown, because the sovereign, holding of no one, was not subject to a relief: but this advantage was counterbalanced by the frequent appeals which he made to their generosity, and which under a powerful prince it was dangerous to resist. They claimed, however, and generally exercised, the right of fixing the amount of such aids, and of raising them as they thought proper, either by the impost of a certain sum on every knight's fee, or the grant of a cer-

¹ Edgar defines the heriot "a payment accustomed to be made to the king for the great men of the land after their death."—Apud Seld. Specil. 153. Canute promises, if a man die intestate, to take no more of his property than the heriot; and if he die in battle for his lord, to forgive the heriot.—Leg. 144, 146. William determines that the relief for a vavasour shall be the horse of the deceased, such as it was at his death.—Leg. 223.

² We have several wills with such provisions. In that of Ælfhelm the first bequest is the heriot, 100 mancuses of gold, two swords, four shields, four spears, two horses with their equipments, and two without: and then an estate is ordered to be sold for 100 mancuses of gold to pay the heriot.—Apud Lye, App. No. ii. It appears that under the Saxons some persons had obtained an exemption from this payment. There were a few in Kent. Nomine eorum de quatuor levis non relevantium terram, similium Alnodo cilt. Otherwise all paid it, who had the jurisdiction of sac and soc. De terris eorum habet relevamen qui habent suam sacam et socum.—Domesd. 1, a. 2.

³ Compare the laws of Canute (Leg. Sax. 144) with those of the Conqueror (p. 223). Both equally refer to the personal estate of the deceased. If a knight were so poor that he left not horses nor armour, William decided that his relief should be 100 shillings. This always remained the relief of a knight's fee. But the relief for a barony continued arbitrary (Glan. ix. 4); obviously because baronies or fees held in chief of the king were some of greater and others of smaller value.

⁴ Glanv. ix. 8. Spelm. Arch. 53.

tain portion from the moveables of each individual, varying according to circumstances from a fortieth to a fifth of their estimated value.

6. Fees of inheritance necessarily required limitations as to alienation and descent. The law would not permit the actual tenant to defeat the will of his lord, or the rights of his issue. Whatever he had acquired by purchase, or industry, or favour, remained at his own disposal; but the fee which he had received to transmit to his descendants, he could neither devise by will, nor alienate by gift or sale. After his death, it went, whether he would or not, to the nearest heir, who inherited the whole, and was bound to perform the services originally stipulated.¹ It was, however, long before the right of representation in descents could be fully established. That the eldest son of the first tenant was the legitimate heir, was universally admitted: but considerable doubts were entertained, whether at the death of the second, the fee should descend to his son or his brother; for, if the former were the nearest in blood to the late possessor, the latter was nearest to the original feoffee. This uncertainty is the more deserving of the reader's attention, as in the descent of the crown it explains the occasional interruptions which he has beheld in the line of representation, and the part which the thanes or barons took in the election of the sovereign. If the son of the last king were a minor, the claim of the young prince was often opposed by that of his uncle, whose appeal to the great council was generally sanctioned by the national approbation.²

7. The descent of fees brought with it two heavy grievances, wardships and marriages, which were unknown in most feudal constitutions, and in England experienced long and obstinate opposition. That attempts had been made to introduce them at an early period, is not improbable; from the charter of Henry I. it is certain that both had been established under the reign of his brother, William Rufus, perhaps even of his father, the Conqueror.³ After a long struggle it was finally decided that, when the heir was a minor, he should not hold the fee, because his age rendered him incapable of performing military service. The lord immediately entered into possession, and appropriated the profits to himself, or gave them to a favourite, or let them out to farm. Nor was this all. He separated the heir from his mother and relations, and took him under his own custody, on the ground that it was his interest to see that the young man was educated in a manner which might hereafter fit him for the performance of military service.⁴ He was, however, obliged to defray all the expenses of his ward, and to grant to him, when he had completed his twenty-first year, the livery of his estate without the payment of the relief.⁵

8. But frequently the heirs were females; and, as they could not per-

¹ Leg. 268. Glanv. vii. 3.

² Thus though Ethelred left two sons, Alfred succeeded to the throne. In the same manner Edred succeeded his brother Edmund, in preference to his nephews Edwy and Edgar.

³ Chart. Hen. I. apud Wilk. Leg. 233. From the words of the charter the reader would not infer that they were recent institutions.

⁴ Quis, says Fortescue, infantem talem in actibus bellicis, quos facere ratione tenuræ suæ ipse astringitur domino feodi, melius instruere poterit aut velit quam dominus ille, cui ab eo servitium tale debetur, &c.—De Laud. Leg. Ang. p. 105.

⁵ Glanv. vii. 9. Speim. 565.

form military service, every precaution was taken to guard against the prejudice which might be suffered from their succession. Their father was forbidden to give them in marriage without the consent of the lord; which, however, he could not refuse without showing a reasonable cause. When the tenant died, the fee descended to the daughter, or if they were more than one, to all the daughters in common. The lord had the wardship: as each completed her fourteenth year, he compelled her to marry the man of his choice; or, if he allowed her to remain single, continued to act as her guardian, and could prevent her from marrying without his advice and consent. After marriage the husband exercised all the rights of his wife, did homage in her place, and performed the accustomed services. The pretext for these harassing regulations, was a necessary attention to the interests of the lord, whose fee might otherwise come into the possession of a man unable or unwilling to comply with the obligations; but avarice converted them into a constant source of emolument to the lord, by inducing him to sell the marriages of heiresses to the highest bidder.¹

IV. From the feudal tenures I may be allowed to pass to a few other innovations, which chiefly regard the administration of justice. 1. In the king's court all the members, in the inferior courts the president and principal assessors, were Normans, who, while they were bound to decide in most cases according to the laws, were unable to understand the language, of the natives. For their instruction and guidance the statutes of the Anglo-Saxon kings were translated into Norman. But where the judges were unacquainted with more than one language, it was necessary that the pleadings should be in that idiom. In inferior tribunals much business was of necessity transacted in the language of the people; but in the king's court, which from its superior dignity and authority gradually drew all actions of importance to itself, causes were pleaded, and judgments given, in the Norman tongue. This, added to the consideration that all persons enjoying influence and patronage were foreigners, made the study of that language a necessary branch of education; and those who hoped to advance their children either in the church or state, were careful that they should possess so useful an acquirement.²

2. If the Anglo-Saxon laws abounded with pecuniary penalties, in the Norman code they were equally numerous and still more oppressive. By the former these mulcts were fixed and certain, apportioned with the most scrupulous exactitude to the supposed enormity of the offence; in the latter almost every transgression subjected the delinquent to an *amerciamen*t;

¹ Glan. vii. 12. This whole system was at last abolished by the statute of the 12th of Charles II., by which "all tenures by knight-service of the king, or of any other person, and by knight-service in capite, and socage in capite of the king, and the fruits and consequences thereof, were taken away or discharged, and all tenures of honours, manors, lands, &c., were turned into free and common socage."

² Ingulf, 71, 88. He attributes the preference which the Normans gave to their own tongue to their hatred of the English. Ipsum etiam idioma tantum abhorrebant, quod leges terræ, statutaque Anglicorum regum lingua Gallica tractarentur, et pueris

etiam in scholis principia literarum grammatica Gallice, et non Anglice traderentur (p. 71). Their ignorance of the English tongue appears to me a much better reason; but still less can I believe with Holkot that the king entertained the absurd idea of abolishing the English language.—Ead. Spicil. 189. For Orderic assures us that William himself applied to the study of the English tongue, that he might understand the causes pleaded before him; though age and business prevented him from making great progress. Anglicam locutionem sagaciter edicere, ut sine interprete, querelam, subjectæ legis posset intelligere (p. 243, edit. Maseres).

that is, placed his personal estate at the mercy of his lord; who in the exercise of this arbitrary right frequently multiplied the number, and augmented the amount of the penalties. The king, indeed, ordered the Anglo-Saxon customs to be observed; but the prejudices or interest of the judges led them to impose the amerciements of the Normans. It was an evil grievously felt by the people; and to procure a remedy for the abuse, seems to have been one of the principal objects of those, who so frequently, for more than a century, petitioned that the laws "of the good king Edward" might be inviolably observed.

3. Though the natives were at last compelled to submit to the invaders, they often gratified their revenge by private assassination. To provide for the security of his followers, the king did not enact a new, but revived an old, statute; and the same penalty which Canute imposed for the murder of a Dane, was imposed by William for the violent death of a Norman. If the assassin was not delivered to the officers of justice within the space of eight days, a mulct of forty-six marks was levied on the lord of the manor, or the inhabitants of the hundred, in which the dead body had been found. But the two nations by intermarriages gradually coalesced into one people; at the close of a century it was deemed unnecessary, because it would have been fruitless, to inquire into the descent of the slain; and the law, which had been originally framed to guard the life of the foreigner, was enforced for the protection of every freeman.¹ In legal language the penalty was denominated the "murder," a term which has since been transferred to the crime itself.

4. Both nations were equally accustomed to appeal in their courts to the judgment of God; but the Normans despised the fiery ordeals of the English, and preferred their own trial by battle as more worthy of freemen and warriors. The king sought to satisfy them both. When the opposite parties were countrymen, he permitted them to follow their national customs; when they were not, the appellee, if he were a foreigner or of foreign descent, might offer wager of battle, or, should this be declined, might clear himself by his own oath and the oaths of his witnesses, according to the provisions of the Norman law. But if he were a native, it was left to his option to offer battle, to go to the ordeal, or to produce in his defence the usual number of lawful compurgators.²

5. In all the other Christian countries in Europe the bishops were accustomed to give judgment in spiritual causes in their own particular courts; in England they had always heard and decided such causes in the courts of the hundred. William disapproved of this custom, and by advice of all his prelates and princes forbade the bishops and archdeacons to hear spiritual causes for the future in secular courts, authorized them to establish tribunals of their own, and commanded the sheriffs to compel obedience to the citations of the ecclesiastical judge. By some writers this innovation has been attributed to the policy of the clergy, who sought by the establishment of separate tribunals to render themselves independent on the secular power; by others to that of the barons, whose object it was to remove from the civil courts the only order of men who dared to oppose a barrier to their course villeins and slaves were still reputed Englishmen.—Ibid.

¹ Leg. 222, 228, 490. Sic permixtæ sunt nationes, ut vix discerni possit hodie, de iberis loquor, quis Anglicos, quis Normannus sit genere.—Dial. de Scac. 53. Of

² Ibid. 216, 230. New Bymer, i. 2.

rapacity and injustice. Perhaps the true cause may be found in the law itself, which merely seeks to enforce the observance of the canons, and to assimilate the discipline of the English to that of the foreign churches, by taking from laymen the cognizance of causes relating to the cure of souls.¹ But whatever might be the design of the legislature, the measure was productive of very important consequences. The separation created a strong rivalry between the two jurisdictions, which will occupy the attention of the reader in a subsequent chapter; and by removing so respectable a magistrate as the bishop from the courts of the hundred, became one of the principal causes why they gradually sank into disrepute, and ultimately into desuetude.

V. These innovations will perhaps dispose the reader to conclude that the partiality or interest of William led him to new-model the whole frame of the Anglo-Saxon polity. But the inference is not warranted by the fact. As the northern tribes were all propagated from the same original stock, so their institutions, though diversified by time, and climate, and accident, bore a strong resemblance to each other, and the customs of the conquerors were readily amalgamated with those of the conquered. Of all the feudal services enforced by the Normans, there is not perhaps one of which some obscure trace may not be discovered among the Anglo-Saxons. The victors might extend or improve, but they did not invent or introduce them. The ealdormen of former times, the greater or lesser thanes, the ceorls and theowas seem to have disappeared; but a closer inspection will discover the same orders of men existing under the new names of counts or earls, of barons, of knights, and esquires, of free tenants, and of villeins and neifs. The national council, though it hardly contained a single native, continued to be constituted as it had been formerly, of the principal landed proprietors, the immediate vassals of the crown; it assembled at the same stated periods; it exercised the same judicial and legislative powers. The administration of justice was vested in the ancient tribunals, the king's court, the shire-motes, hundred-motes, and hall-motes; the statutes of the Anglo-Saxon kings, with the provincial customs known by the names of West-Saxon law, Mercian law, and Northumbrian law, were repeatedly confirmed;² and even the rights and privileges of every smaller district and petty lordship were carefully ascertained, and ordered to be observed.

VI. It could not be supposed that the Normans in the provinces, foreigners as they were, and indebted for their possessions to the sword, would respect customs which they deemed barbarous, when they thought them prejudicial to their interests. But, while they tyrannized over the natives, they often defrauded the crown of its ancient rights; and the king, treading perhaps in the footsteps of the great Alfred, to put an end to all uncertainty, ordered an exact survey to be made of every hide of land in the kingdom. Commissioners were sent into the counties, with authority to empanel a jury in each hundred, from whose presentments and verdicts the necessary information might be ob-

¹ Quæ ad regimen animarum pertinet.—Ibid. 292. New Eym. i. 3.

² Leg. Sax. 219. Ing. 88. Hov. 343. It may be that the copy of these laws in Ingulf has been altered in its orthography, but I see no reason to doubt its authenticity. If the Norman judges had to decide according to the Anglo-Saxon laws, it is obvious that a translation was necessary. A Latin translation might suffice for the judges in the higher courts; but it is probable that many of the reeves, presiding in the lower courts belonging to manors, knew no other language than that of Normandy.

tained. They directed their inquiries to every interesting particular, the extent of each estate, its division into arable land, pasture, meadow, and wood; the names of the owner, tenants, and sub-tenants; the number of the inhabitants and their condition, whether it were free or servile; the nature and the obligations of the tenure: the estimated value before and since the conquest, and the amount of the land-tax paid at each of these periods.¹ The returns were transmitted to a board sitting at Winchester, by which they were arranged in order, and placed upon record. We know not the exact time when the commissioners entered on their task; it was completed in 1086. The fruit of their labours was the compilation of two volumes, which were deposited in the Exchequer, and have descended to posterity with the appropriate title of the Domesday, or Book of Judgment.²

VII. From the preceding notices the reader will be able to form some notion of many of the sources from which the king's revenue was derived.

1. The rents of the crown lands were generally paid in kind, and allotted to the support of the royal household.
2. From his military tenants he received considerable sums under the different heads of reliefs, aids, wardships, and the marriages of heiresses. For unless the female ward purchased at a considerable price the permission to wed the man of her own choice, he always disposed of her in marriage by private sale, and obtained a greater or smaller sum in proportion to the value of her fee.³ 3. Escheats and forfeitures continually occurred, and, whether the king retained the lands himself, or gave them after some time to his favourites, they always brought money into the exchequer. 4. The fines paid by litigants for permission to have their quarrels terminated in the king's courts, the mulcts, or pecuniary penalties imposed by the laws, and the amerciaments, which were sometimes customary, generally arbitrary, according to the caprice or discretion of the judges, amounted in the course of each year to enormous sums. 5. He levied tolls at bridges, fairs, and markets, exacted certain customs on the export and import of goods, and received fees and rents, and tallages from the inhabitants of the burghs and ports.⁴ Lastly, William revived the odious tax called the Danegelt, which had been abolished by Edward the Confessor. It was frequently

¹ In these inquiries the king was often deceived by the partiality of the jurors. Inguilf observes that this was the case with respect to the lands of his abbey. Taxatores penes nostrum monasterium benevoli et amantes non ad verum pretium nec ad verum spatium nostrum monasterium libabant misericorditer præcaves in futurum regis exactionibus, et aliis oneribus piissima nobis benevolentia providentes (p. 79). He gives several other instances of false returns.—See also Orderic, 678.

² The first volume is a large folio of vellum, and in 382 double pages, written in a small character, contains thirty-one counties, beginning with Kent, and ending with Lincolnshire. The other is a quarto volume of 460 double pages in a large character, but contains only the counties of Essex, Norfolk, and Sussex. There is no description of the four northern counties, but the West Riding of Yorkshire is made to comprehend that part of Lancashire which lies to the north of the Ribble, with some districts in Westmoreland and Cumberland; while the southern portion of Lancashire is included in Cheshire. Rutland is similarly divided between Nottinghamshire and Lincolnshire.

³ As an instance, Geoffry de Mandeville in the second year of Henry III. gave 20,000 marks to marry Isabella, countess of Gloucester.—Madox, 322.

⁴ Orderic, 258. The tallage was an aid raised by the king's own authority on his demesne lands. The burghs and cities frequently offered a gift in lieu of the tallage, which was occasionally refused. Thus in the 39th of Henry III. the citizens of London offered two thousand marks; but were compelled to pay a tallage of three thousand.—Brady, i. 178. Other lords raised tallages in a similar manner. The word has the same meaning as our present "excise," a cutting off.

levied for his use, at the rate of six shillings on every hide of land under the plough. From all these sources money constantly flowed into the exchequer, till the king was reputed to be the most opulent prince in Christendom. His daily income, even with the exception of fines, gifts, and amerciements, amounted, if we may believe an ancient historian, who seems to write from authentic documents, to 1061*l.* 10*s.* 1*d.*! a prodigious and incredible sum, if we reflect that the pound of that period was equal in weight to three nominal pounds of the present day, and that the value of silver was perhaps ten times as great as in modern times.

After the surrender of Morcar, William had led an army into Normandy to support his interests in the province of Maine. His absence encouraged the malcontents in England to unfurl the banner of insurrection. But the rebels were no longer natives: they were Normans, dissatisfied with the rewards which they had received, and offended by the haughty and overbearing carriage of the king.² At their head were Roger Fitz-Osbern, who had succeeded his father in the earldom of Hereford, and Ralph de Guader, a noble Breton, earl of Norfolk. The latter, in defiance of the royal prohibition, had married the sister of the former; and the two earls, aware of William's vengeance, resolved to anticipate the danger. It was their object to prevent his return to England; to partition the kingdom into the three great divisions of Wessex, Mercia, and Northumbria; to take two of these for themselves, and to give the third to Waltheof, whose accession to the confederacy would, they expected, secure the co-operation of the natives. Waltheof refused to engage in the enterprise; but imprudently suffered himself to be sworn to secrecy. Soon, however, the preparations of the conspirators excited suspicion. Archbishop Lanfranc, who seems to have governed in the absence of the king, repeatedly sent to Guader most affectionate and admonitory messages. They produced no effect. The Breton, at the head of his retainers, pillaged the king's lands. By Lanfranc he was excommunicated; by William de Warenne, and Richard de Bienfait, the justiciaries, he was defeated in the field of Bicham³ in Norfolk. He escaped to his castle of Norwich; of his followers, all those who fell into the hands of the pursuers suffered the amputation of the right foot. The castle was immediately besieged: not one of his confederates moved to his relief, and he surrendered on condition that he and his Bretons might leave the kingdom. Guader sailed immediately to the Baltic, to offer his services to the king of Denmark, who, as successor to Canute, claimed the crown of England; but after some stay there, returned to his patrimonial estates in Bretagne.⁴

When William returned from Normandy, he summoned a council of his barons at London. In this court Guader was outlawed; Fitz-Osbern was convicted of treason, and sentenced, according to the Norman code, to perpetual imprisonment, and the loss of his property. His father's services indeed pleaded forcibly in his favour;

¹ Orderic, 258. Paris, 597.

² They accused him of having banished for life Warleng, earl of Mortagne, for an offensive expression; and of having procured by poison the death of Conan, earl of Bretagne, and of Walter, earl of Pontoise.—Orderic, p. 303, 304. But it appears from William of Jumiege (vii. 19) that the words of Warleng were a sufficient evidence of a conspiracy against his sovereign; and the other charges were but reports which had never been substantiated.—See Maseres, Orderic, 305, note.

³ The battle was fought in campo qui Fagaduna dicitur, which I conceive to be a translation of the English name Beecham.—Orderic, 318.

⁴ Compare Orderic, 302—307, with Lanfranc's Epistles, 310, and Ellis, 3rd series, i. p. 4—10.

but his proud and ungovernable temper disdained to ask for mercy.¹ Waltheof was next arraigned. His secret had been betrayed by the perfidy of Judith, who had fixed her affections on a Norman nobleman, and was anxious to emancipate herself from her English husband. By the Anglo-Saxon law treason was punished with death and forfeiture; but the guilt of Waltheof was rather of that species which has since been denominated misprision of treason. He had been acquainted with the conspiracy, and had not as a faithful vassal disclosed it to his sovereign. His judges were divided in opinion; and the unfortunate earl continued during a year a close prisoner in the castle of Winchester. Archbishop Lanfranc laboured to procure his release; but the intrigues of his wife, and of the nobleman who sought his estates, defeated the efforts of the primate. Waltheof was condemned to die, and executed at an early hour the next morning, before the citizens could be apprized of his intended fate. By the natives his death was sincerely deplored. They deemed him the victim of Norman injustice, and revered his memory as that of a martyr.²

The reader will be pleased to learn that the perfidy of Judith experienced a suitable retribution. William ordered her to marry a foreign nobleman, named Simon; but she refused to give her hand to a husband that was deformed. The king knew how to punish her disobedience. Simon married the eldest daughter of Waltheof,³ and received the estates of her father: Judith was left to languish in poverty, unpitied by the English or the Normans, and the object of general hatred or contempt.⁴

The remaining transactions of the king's reign may be divided into those which regarded his English, and those which regarded his transmarine dominions. I. He led a powerful army into Wales, established his superiority over the natives of that country, and restored to freedom several hundreds of English slaves.⁵ Malcolm of Scotland had renewed his ravages in Northumberland; and Robert, the eldest son of the Conqueror, was sent to chastise his perfidy. But the two princes did not meet; and the only result of the expedition was the foundation of Newcastle on the left bank of the Tyne.⁶ The earldom of the country had been given, after the condemnation of Waltheof, to Walcher, a native of Lorraine, who had been lately raised to the episcopal see of Durham. The bishop was of a mild and easy disposition; his humanity revolted from the idea of oppressing the inhabitants himself; but indolence prevented him from seeing or from restraining the oppressions of his officers. Liulf, a noble Englishman, had ventured to accuse them before the prelate; and in the course of a few days he was slain. Walcher, to allay the ferment, declared his innocence of the homicide; compelled the murderers to offer the legal compen-

¹ When the king sent him a valuable present of clothes, he kindled a fire in his prison, and burnt them.—Ord. p. 322. From another passage in the same writer we learn that earls were distinguished by a particular dress.—Id. p. 327. It is probable the articles sent to Fitz-Osbern were of that description. They consisted of a vest of silk, interlata serica, a mantle, chlamys, and a shorter cloak of the skins of martens (rheno de pretiosis pellibus peregrinorum marium).—Ord. p. 322.

² I have chiefly followed Orderic (p. 302—327), who minutely describes the whole affair. According to some of our chroniclers, Waltheof was more guilty, having at first embarked in the conspiracy.—Malm. 58. Hunt. 211.

³ This lady's name was Matilda. After the death of Simon she married David, who became king of Scotland in 1126. In her right he was earl of Huntingdon, which dignity for some centuries afterwards was annexed to the crown of Scotland.—Script. Nor. p. 702.

⁴ Ingulf, 73.

⁵ Chron. Sax. 184. Hunt. 212.

⁶ Simeon, 211. Brompt. 977. West. 228.

sation; and engaged to act as mediator between them and the relations of Liulf. Both parties met by agreement at Gateshead; but the bishop perceiving indications of violence among the natives, retired into the church. It was set on fire. He compelled the murderers to go out, who were immediately slain. At length, unable to bear the violence of the flames, he wrapped his mantle round his head, and appeared at the door. A voice immediately exclaimed: "Good rede, short rede; 'slay ye the bishop!" and he fell pierced with a number of wounds. The king commissioned his brother Odo to avenge the fate of Walcher. The guilty absconded at his approach; but Odo thinking it unnecessary to discriminate between guilt and innocence, executed without investigation such of the natives as fell into his hands, and ravaged the whole country.²

This prelate, who had so long enjoyed the friendship, was at last destined to experience the resentment of his brother. Odo, not content with the rank which he held in Normandy and England, aspired to the papacy. The fortune of the Guiscard had excited the most extravagant expectations in the minds of his countrymen; and it was believed that with a Norman pope, the whole of Italy must fall under the yoke of the Normans. By what means Odo was to obtain the papal dignity, we are not informed; but several of William's favourite officers had pledged themselves to follow the prelate. The scheme was defeated by the promptitude of the king; who seized the treasures designed for the enterprise, and ordered his attendants to apprehend his brother. They hesitated out of respect to the episcopal character. William arrested him himself; and, when Odo remonstrated, he replied, "It is not the bishop of Bayeaux, but the earl of Kent that I make my prisoner." He remained in close confinement till the death of the king.³

The Conqueror had reached the zenith of his power, when a new and formidable antagonist arose in the north, Canute, the son of Sveno, who had succeeded to the throne of Denmark. Like the king of England, he was an illegitimate child: but the disgrace of his birth was lost in the splendour of his abilities. Determined to claim the English crown, as successor of his namesake, Canute the Great, he obtained a fleet of sixty ships from Olave, king of Norway, and a promise of another six hundred sail from his father-in-law, Robert, earl of Flanders. William felt considerable alarm: conscious that he could not depend on the affections of his subjects, he collected adventurers from every nation of Europe; the treasures which he had amassed with unfeeling avarice, were employed in the hire of auxiliaries, and the natives were astonished and dismayed at the multitudes of armed foreigners whom he introduced into the island.⁴ For more than a year Canute lingered in the port of

¹ An old proverb — meaning that the shortest counsel is the best.

² Sim. 47. Malm. 62. Chron. Sax. 184. Flor. 639. Alur. Bev. 135.

³ Chron. Sax. 184. Flor. 641. Malm. 63. Orderic apud Du Chesne, 573. The distinction between the bishop of Bayeux and earl of Kent was suggested by Lanfranc. — Knyghton, 2359.

⁴ Chron. Sax. 186. If the reader be surprised that William could engage such numbers of foreigners in his service, he should recollect that the Gothic nations were still attached to the habits of their fathers. From Tacitus (Germ. xiii. xiv.) we learn that the young men as soon as they had solemnly received their arms, entered into the service of some celebrated chieftains; or, if their own tribes were at peace, sought military glory in some foreign nation. It was the same in the eleventh century. The young men destined to the profession of arms, became the retainers of one of their chiefs at home, or travelled to seek their fortune abroad. Hence mercenaries were always to be obtained. As every baron sought to surround himself with knights and their esquires, the in-

Haithaby.¹ His wishes were continually disappointed, and his commands disobeyed. The prevalence of contrary winds, or the deficiency of provisions, or the absence of the principal officers, prevented his departure. At length a mutiny burst forth, and the armament was dispersed. Some have ascribed the failure of the expedition to the influence of the presents which William had distributed among the Danes; while others have referred it to the perfidious ambition of Olave, the brother of Canute.²

II. When the king undertook the invasion of England, he had reason to fear for the security of his own dominions during his absence; and on that account had attempted to allay the jealousy of the king of France, by stipulating, in the event of success, to resign Normandy to his eldest son Robert. The young prince was accordingly invested with the nominal government of the duchy under the superintendence of his mother Matilda;³ and on two occasions was permitted to receive the homage of the Norman barons as their immediate lord. But when he had grown up, and claimed what he conceived to be his right, William gave him a peremptory refusal.⁴

Robert's discontent, which had been kept alive by the secret suggestions of his friends, was roused into a flame by the imprudence of his brothers, William and Henry. These princes were proud of their superior favour with their father, and jealous of the ambitious pretensions of Robert. While the court remained for a few days in the little town of L'Aigle, they went to the house which had been allotted for the residence of their brother, and from a balcony emptied a pitcher of water on his head, as he walked before the door. Alberic de Grentmesnil exhorted him to avenge the insult; and with his drawn sword he rushed up stairs; when the alarm was given, and William hastening to the spot, succeeded with difficulty in separating his children. But Robert secretly withdrew the same evening, made an unsuccessful attempt to surprise the castle of Rouen, and meeting with supporters among the Norman barons, levied war upon his father.⁵ He was, however, soon driven out of Normandy, and compelled to wander during five years in the neighbouring countries, soliciting aid from his friends, and spending on his pleasures the moneys which they advanced. From his mother Matilda he received frequent and valuable presents; but William, though he excused her conduct on the plea of maternal affection, severely punished her messengers as wanting in duty to their sovereign. At last the exile fixed his residence in the castle of Gerberoi, which he had received from the king of France; and supported himself and his followers by the plunder of the adjacent country. William laid siege to the castle; and, on one occasion, the father and son accidentally engaged in single combat without knowing each other. The youth of Robert was more than a match for the age of William. He wounded his father in the hand, and killed the horse under him. Tokig, who brought the king a second horse, and several of his companions, were creased demand had increased their number; and as the duration of their services was frequently very limited, thousands were at all times ready to obey any call that promised wealth and glory.

¹ Now Haddeby, on the right bank of the river Schle, opposite to Schleswig.—See Ethelwerd, 474.

² Chron. Sax. 187. Flor. 641. Malm. 60.

Ælnoth, Vit. Can. xiii. Chron. Petro. 51. Saxo, 217.

³ That princess died in 1083. To her is generally attributed the long piece of tapestry representing the conquest of England, and preserved in the cathedral of Bayeux.—But see note, Appendix (A) at the end of this volume.

⁴ Orderic, 349.

⁵ Orderic, 351.

left dead on the field. William, in despair of success, retired from the siege; but his resentment was gradually appeased, and a reconciliation apparently effected, by the tears and entreaties of Matilda.¹

As the king advanced in years, he grew excessively corpulent; and to reduce his bulk, submitted by the advice of his physicians to a long course of medicine. Philip of France, in allusion to this circumstance, said in a conversation with his courtiers, that the king of England was lying in at Rouen. When this insipid jest, which cost the lives of hundreds who never heard of it, was reported to William, he burst into a paroxysm of rage. His martial spirit could not brook the indignity of being compared to a woman; and he swore that at his churching he would set all France in a blaze.² He was no sooner able to sit on horseback than he summoned his troops, entered the French territory, pillaged every thing around him, and took by surprise the city of Mante, which during his minority had been severed from his patrimonial dominions. By the orders of the king, or through the wantonness of the soldiery, the town was immediately set on fire, and many of the inhabitants perished in the conflagration. William rode to view the scene, when his horse, chancing to tread on the embers, by a violent effort to extricate himself, threw the king on the pommel of the saddle; and the bruise produced a rupture accompanied with fever and inflammation. He was conveyed back in a dangerous state to the suburbs of Rouen, where he lingered for the space of three weeks.

During his illness he enjoyed the full use of his faculties, and conversed freely with his attendants on the different transactions of his reign. A few days before his death he assembled the prelates and barons round his bed, and in their presence bequeathed to his son Robert, who was absent, Normandy with its dependencies. It was, he observed, the inheritance which he had received from his fathers; and, on that account, he was willing that it should descend to his eldest son. To England he had no better right than what he derived from the sword; the succession therefore to that kingdom he would leave to the decision of God; though it was his ardent wish that it might fall to the lot of his second son. At the same time he advised William to repair to England, and gave him a recommendatory letter directed to Archbishop Lanfranc. He had hitherto made no mention of Henry, the third brother; and the impatience of the prince urged him to inquire of his father what portion was left to him. "Five thousand pounds of silver," was his answer. "But what use can I have for the money," said the prince, "if I have not a home to live in?" The king replied: "Be patient, and thou shalt inherit the fortunes of both thy brothers."³ William immediately began his journey for England; Henry hastened to the treasury, and received his money.

After the departure of the two princes, it was suggested to the king that if he hoped for mercy from God he ought to show mercy to man, and to liberate the many noble prisoners whom he kept in confinement. He first endeavoured to justify their detention, partly on the ground of

¹ According to Florence (c.19), as soon as Robert knew his father, he dismounted, and helped him on horseback; I have preferred the narrative of the Chronicon Lambardi (ad ann. 1079), as the more ancient authority.

² It was customary for the woman who was churching, to bear in her hand a lighted taper.

³ Ord. 655—660. This prophecy was probably invented after Henry's accession to the throne.

The Burial of William the Conqueror, by W. A. 1844.

their treasons, partly on the plea of necessity; and then assented to the request, but excepted his brother Odo, a man, he observed, whose turbulence would be the ruin of both England and Normandy. The friends of the prelate, however, were importunate; and at last by repeated solicitations extorted from the reluctant monarch an order for his immediate enlargement.

Early in the morning of the 9th of September the king heard the sound of a bell, and eagerly inquired what it meant. He was informed that it tolled the hour of prime in the church of St. Mary. "Then," said he, stretching out his arms, "I commend my soul to my lady, the mother of God, that by her holy prayers she may reconcile me to her son my Lord Jesus Christ;" and immediately expired. From the events which followed his death, the reader may judge of the unsettled state of society at the time. The knights and prelates hastened to their respective homes to secure their property; the citizens of Rouen began to conceal their most valuable effects; the servants rifled the palace, and hurried away with their booty; and the royal corpse for three hours lay almost in a state of nudity on the ground. At length the archbishop ordered the body to be interred at Caen; and Hurluin, a neighbouring knight, out of compassion, conveyed it at his own expense to that city.

At the day appointed for the interment, Prince Henry, the Norman prelates, and a multitude of clergy and people, assembled in the church of St. Stephen, which the Conqueror had founded. The mass had been performed, the corpse was placed on the bier; and the bishop of Evreux had pronounced the panegyric of the deceased, when a voice from the crowd exclaimed, "He whom you have praised was a robber. The very land on which you stand is mine. By violence he took it from my father: and in the name of God I forbid you to bury him in it." The speaker was Asceline Fitz-Arthur, who had often but fruitlessly sought reparation from the justice of William. After some debate the prelates called him to them, paid him sixty shillings for the grave, and promised that he should receive the full value of his land. The ceremony was then continued, and the body of the king deposited in a coffin of stone.¹

William's character has been drawn with apparent impartiality in the Saxon Chronicle, by a contemporary and an Englishman. That the reader may learn the opinion of one, who possessed the means of forming an accurate judgment, I shall transcribe the passage, retaining as far as it may be intelligible, the very phraseology of the original.

"If any one wish to know what manner of man he was, or what worship he had, or of how many lands he were the lord, we will describe him as we have known him; for we looked on him, and some while lived in his herd. King William was a very wise man, and very rich, more worshipful and stronger than any of his foregangers. He was mild to good men, who loved God; and stark beyond all bounds to those who withsaid his will. On the very stede, where God gave him to win England, he reared a noble monastery, and set monks therein, and endowed it well. He was very worshipful. Thrice he bore his king-helmet every year, when he was in England; at Easter he bore it at Winchester, at Pentecost at Westminster, and in mid-winter at

¹ Eadmer, p. 13. Order. 661, 662. In 1562, when Coligni took the city of Caen, his tomb was rifled by the soldiers, and some of his bones were brought to England.—See Baker, p. 31.

Gloucester. And then were with him all the rich men over all England; archbishops and diocesan bishops, abbots and earls, thanes and knights. Moreover he was a very stark man, and very savage; so that no man durst do any thing against his will. He had earls in his bonds, who had done against his will; bishops he set off their bishoprics, abbots off their abbotries, and thanes in prisons; and at last he did not spare his own brother Odo. Him he set in prison. Yet among other things we must not forget the good frith¹ which he made in this land; so that a man, that was good for aught, might travel over the kingdom with his bosom full of gold without molestation; and no man durst slay another man, though he had suffered never so mickle evil from the other. He ruled over England; and by his cunning he was so thoroughly acquainted with it, that there is not a hide of land, of which he did not know, both who had it and what was its worth; and that he set down in his writings. Wales was under his weald, and therein he wrought castles; and he wielded the Isle of Man withal; moreover he subdued Scotland by his mickle strength; Normandy was his by kinn; and over the earldom called Manns he ruled; and if he might have lived yet two years, he would have won Ireland by the fame of his power, and without any armament. Yet truly in his time men had mickle suffering, and very many hardships. Castles he caused to be wrought, and poor men to be oppressed. He was so very stark. He took from his subjects many marks of gold, and many hundred pounds of silver; and that he took, some by right, and some by mickle might, for very little ned. He had fallen into avarice, and greediness he loved withal." "He let his lands to fine as dear as he could; then came some other and bade more than the first had given, and the king let it to him who bade more. Then came a third, and bid yet more, and the king let it into the hands of the man who bade the most. Nor did he reck how sinfully his reeves got money of poor men, or how many unlawful things they did. For the more men talked of right law, the more they did against the law." "He also set many deer-friths;² and he made laws therewith, that whosoever should slay hart or hind, him man should blind. As he forbade the slaying of harts, so also did he of boars. So much he loved the high-deer, as if he had been their father. He also decreed about hares, that they should go free. His rich men moaned, and the poor men murmured; but he was so hard that he recked not the hatred of them all. For it was need they should follow the king's will withal, if they wished to live, or to have lands, or goods, or his favour. Alas, that any man should be so moody, and should so puff up himself, and think himself above all other men! May Almighty God have mercy on his soul, and grant him forgiveness of his sins!"³

To this account may be added a few particulars gleaned from other historians. The king was of ordinary stature but inclined to corpulency. His countenance wore an air of ferocity, which, when he was agitated by passion, struck terror into every beholder. The story told of his strength at one period of life almost exceeds belief. It is said, that sitting on horseback, he could draw the string of a bow, which no other man could bend even on foot. Hunting formed his favourite amusement. The reader has seen the censure passed upon him for his deer-friths and game-laws; nor will he think it undeserved, if he attend to the following instance. Though the king possessed sixty-eight forests, besides parks and chases, in different parts of England, he was not satisfied, but for the occasional accommodation of his court, afforested an extensive tract of country lying between the river Avon and the Bay of Southampton. The inhabitants were expelled; the cottages and the churches were burnt; more than thirty square miles of arable land were withdrawn from cultivation, and the whole district was converted into a wilderness, to afford sufficient range for the deer, and ample space for the royal diversion. The memory of this act of despotism has been perpetuated in the name of the New Forest, which it retains at the present day, after the lapse of seven hundred and fifty years.¹

¹ Frith is the king's peace or protection, which has been frequently mentioned, and the violation of which subjected the offender to a heavy fine.

² Deer-friths were forests in which the deer were under the king's protection or frith.

³ Saxon Chron. 189—191.

William's education had left on his mind religious impressions which were never effaced. When indeed his power or interest was concerned, he listened to no suggestions, but those of ambition or of avarice; but on other occasions he displayed a strong sense of religion, and a profound respect for its institutions. He daily heard the mass of his private chaplain, and was regular in his attendance at the public worship; in the company of men celebrated for holiness of life, he laid aside that haughty demeanour, with which he was accustomed to awe the most powerful of his barons; he willingly concurred in the deposition of his uncle Malger, archbishop of Rouen, who disgraced his dignity by the immorality of his conduct;² and showed that he knew how to value and recompense virtue, by endeavouring to place in the same church the monk Guitmond, from whom he had formerly received so severe a reprimand.³ On the decease of a prelate, he appointed officers to protect the property of the vacant archbishopric or abbey, and named a successor with the advice of the principal clergy.⁴ Lanfranc, in his numerous struggles against the rapacity of the Normans, was constantly patronised by the king; who appointed him with certain other commissioners to compel the sheriffs of the several counties to restore to the Church whatever had been unjustly taken from it since the invasion.⁵

There were, however, three points, according to Eadmer, in which the king unjustly invaded the ecclesiastical rights. 1. During his reign the Christian world was afflicted and scandalized by the rupture between Gregory VII. and the emperor Henry VI., who in opposition to his adversary created an antipope, Guibert, bishop of Ravenna. The conflicting claims of these prelates, and the temporal pretensions of Gregory, afforded a pretext to William to introduce a new regulation. He would not permit the authority of any particular pontiff to be acknowledged in his dominions, without his previous approbation; and he directed that all letters issued from the court of Rome should, on their arrival, be submitted to the royal inspection. 2. Though he zealously concurred with Archbishop Lanfranc in his endeavours to reform the manners of both the clergy and the laity, yet so jealous was he of any ¹ The forest of Ytene was prior to the time of the Conqueror, who added to it, before Domesday was compiled, 140 hides, or about 17,000 acres, according to the computation of the Rev. Mr. Bingley.—See Ellis's Introd. to Domesday, xxxiv.

² Chron. Sax. 189. Eadmer, 13. Gul. Pict. 93.

³ Orderic, 269. See p. 233.

⁴ Id. 233.

⁵ See the original commission in Brady, ii. App. p. 3—6.

encroachment on his authority, that without the royal license he would not permit the decisions of national or provincial synods to be carried into effect.¹ 3. After the separation of the ecclesiastical courts from those of the hundred, he enacted such laws as were necessary to support the jurisdiction of the former; but at the same time forbade them either to implead, or to excommunicate any individual, holding in chief of the crown, till the nature of the offence had been certified to himself.²

A friendly intercourse by letters and presents subsisted between William and the pope Alexander II. Alexander was succeeded by the celebrated Hildebrand, who assumed the name of Gregory VII. The king congratulated the new pontiff on his advancement to the papacy, and in return was commended by him for his attachment to the Holy See, for the zeal with which he enforced the celibacy of the clergy,³ and for his piety in not exposing to sale, like other kings, the vacant abbeys and bishoprics.⁴ The Peter-pence had been annually paid during the pontificate of Alexander: but after his death it had for some unknown reason been suspended during a few years.⁵ Gregory, who considered it as a feudal prestation, had commissioned his legate Hubert to require not only the payment of the money, but, as a consequence of that payment, the performance of homage. Such a requisition to a prince of William's imperious temper must have been highly irritating. But his answer, though firm, was respectful. He acknowledged the omission of the payment, and promised that it should be rectified; but to the demand of homage he returned an absolute refusal. He had never promised it himself; his predecessors had never performed it; nor did he know of any other ground on which it could be claimed.⁶

Though Gregory was disappointed, yet, beset as he was with enemies, he had the prudence to suppress his feelings, and till his death, in 1085, continued to correspond with the king, who acknowledged him as the legitimate successor of St. Peter, and refused to admit a legate from the antipope Guibert.⁷

During William's reign the people of England were exposed to calamities of every description. It commenced with years of carnage and devastation; its progress was marked by a regular system of confiscation and oppression; and this succession of evils was closed with famine and pestilence. In 1086, a summer more rainy and tempestuous than had been experienced in the memory of man, occasioned a total failure of the harvest; and the winter introduced a malignant disease, which attacked one-half of the inhabitants, and is said to have proved fatal to many thousands. Even of those who escaped the infection, or recovered from the disease, numbers perished afterwards from want, or unwholesome

¹ Thus in the synod of London the bishops ask the king's permission to transfer the episcopal sees from one town to another; yet the translation of the see of Dorchester to Lincoln is said, in the original charter, to be made by the advice and authority of Pope Alexander, his legates, the Archbishop Lanfranc, and the other prelates.—Monast. Ang. iii. 268.

² Eadmer, 6.

³ In the synod of Winchester (1078) it had been decreed that such priests in country places as were married might retain their wives, but that no one for the future should be ordained who did not make a vow of celibacy.—Wilk. Con. i.

⁴ Ep. Greg. VII. l. i. ep. 70, 71; ix. 5.

⁵ Baron. ad ann. 1088, n. 1. ad ann. 1079, n. 25. Selden, Spicil. ad Ead. 164. The Peter-pence was not peculiar to England. It had been established in Gaul, by Charlemagne.—Greg. VII. ep. ix. 1.

⁶ Greg. VII. ep. ix. 1.

⁷ Baron. ad ann. 1080, n. 23. Greg. VII. ep. vii. 23, 25. New Rym. i. 3.

nourishment. "Alas," exclaims an eye-witness, "how miserable, how rueful a time was that! The wretched victims had nearly perished by the fever; then came the sharp hunger, and destroyed them outright. Who is so hard-hearted as not to weep over such calamities?"¹

CHAPTER IX.

WILLIAM II.

CONTEMPORARY PRINCES.

Emp. of Ger. Henry IV.	Kings of Scotland. Malcolm III. died in...1093 Donald Bane, dep.....1094 Duncan, died in 1094 Donald Bane.....1097 Edgar.	K. of France. Philip I.	K. of Spain. Alphonso VI.
	Popes. Urban II. died in 1099.	Paschal II.

WILLIAM SUCCEEDS—HIS WARS WITH HIS BROTHER ROBERT—HE OBTAINS NORMANDY WHILE ROBERT GOES TO THE HOLY LAND—INVADES SCOTLAND—AND WALES—HIS RAPACITY—HE PERSECUTES ARCHBISHOP ANSELM—IS KILLED IN THE NEW FOREST—HIS CHARACTER.

THE Conqueror had left three sons by Matilda. Robert, the eldest, resided a voluntary exile in the town of Abbeville, and supported himself and his associates by frequent incursions into his native country.² On the death of his father he repaired in haste to Rouen, and was acknowledged without opposition as duke of Normandy. The prince was open, generous, and brave; but at the same time thoughtless, fickle, and voluptuous. His credulity made him the dupe of the false and designing; and his prodigality often reduced him to a state of poverty and dependence. If his courage was occasionally roused into action, his exertions were but temporary, and he soon relapsed into habits of ease and indulgence. Pleased with the acquisition of the ducal coronet, he let slip the golden opportunity of placing on his head the crown of England: in a few years he lost the duchy of Normandy by his indolence and misconduct; and at last he terminated his life in a dungeon, the prisoner of his youngest brother.

William, surnamed Rufus, or "the Red," was the next in age, and with the ambition had inherited the promptitude and policy of his father. He was the Conqueror's favourite, had accompanied him in all his journeys, and fought by his side in all his battles. From the bed of the dying monarch he hastened to England, accompanied by Bloet, a confidential messenger, and the bearer of a recommendationary letter to Lanfranc, who, his father called him Gamberon, and Court-hose: that is, literally, Round-legs, and Short-hose; surnames which he retained as long as he lived.

¹ Chron. Sax. 188.

² Robert was corpulent, and below the ordinary stature. From this circumstance

though he had been William's preceptor, had conferred on him the order of knighthood,¹ and secretly supported his pretensions, refused to declare in his favour, till the prince had promised upon oath (many of his friends also swore with him) that he would govern according to law and justice, and would ask and follow the advice of the primate.²

A council of the prelates and barons was then summoned to proceed to the election of a sovereign. Though the principles of hereditary succession were yet unsettled, yet the English history furnished no precedent, in which the younger had been preferred to the elder brother. But of the friends of Robert many were in Normandy; others were silenced by the presence, or won by the promises, of William; and Lanfranc directed the whole influence of the Church in his favour. In the third week from the death of his father he was chosen king, and was immediately crowned (Sept. 26) with the usual solemnities.³

The third and remaining son was named Henry. His portion of five thousand pounds did not satisfy his ambition; but necessity compelled him to acquiesce for the present; and he silently watched the course of events, determined to seize the first opportunity of aggrandizement, which fortune or the misconduct of his brothers might throw in his way.

It has been mentioned that the Conqueror on his death-bed had consented to the liberation of his prisoners. Of these the Normans recovered their former estates and honours both in England and on the continent; Ulf, the son of Harold, and Duncan, the son of the king of Scots, repaired to Rouen, received from Robert the order of knighthood, and were dismissed with valuable presents; and the earl Morcar, and Wulfnoth, the brother of Harold, followed William to England with the vain hope of obtaining suitable establishments in their own country. But the cautious policy of the new monarch had prepared for them a different reception. They were arrested at Winchester, and confined in the castle.⁴

Odo of Bayeux had always hated Lanfranc as his personal enemy; and William now became the object of his aversion, because the young prince listened to the counsels of Lanfranc. By his intrigues he soon formed a party in favour of Robert. It required no great eloquence to persuade those who had possessions both in England and Normandy that it was for their interest to hold their lands of one and the same sovereign; and, if a choice were to be made between the two brothers, there could be no doubt that the easy and generous disposition of Robert deserved the preference before the suspicious temper and overbearing carriage of William. According to custom, the king held his court at the festival of Easter. The discontented barons employed the opportunity to mature their plans, and departed to raise the standard of rebellion in their respective districts: Odo in Kent, William, bishop of Durham, in Northumberland, Geoffrey of Coutances in Somerset, Roger Montgomery in Shropshire, Hugh Bigod in Norfolk,

¹ This ceremony is thus described. Eum lorica induit, et galeam capiti ejus imposuit, eique militie cingulum in n. mine Domini cinxit.—Orderic, 685.

² Eadm. 13. William's pretensions rested solely on the wish in his favour expressed by his father, who, though he could not prevent his eldest son from succeeding to Normandy, because it was the patrimony of the family, might, it was contended, dispose of the crown of England as he pleased, because he had not inherited it from his father, but had acquired it.

³ Chron. Sax. 192.

⁴ Sim. 214. Hoved. 284. Alur. 136. William had excepted Roger Fitz-Osbern from this act of clemency. He remained in prison till death.—Orderic, apud Maseres, 322.

and Hugh de Grentmesnil in the county of Leicester. The duke of Normandy was already acquainted with their intention; but instead of waiting for his arrival, or of uniting their forces against their enemy, they contented themselves with fortifying their castles, and ravaging the king's lands in the neighbourhood.¹

In this emergency William owed the preservation of his crown to the native English, whose eagerness to revenge the wrongs which their country had received from the Norman chieftains, led them in crowds to the royal standard. The earl bishop, conceiving that the first attempt of his nephew would be directed against the strong castle of Rochester, had intrusted that fortress to the care of Eustace, earl of Boulogne, with a garrison of five hundred knights; and retiring to Pevensey, awaited with impatience the promised arrival of Robert. The king followed him thither, shut him up within the walls, and after a siege of seven weeks, compelled him to surrender. His life and liberty were granted him on the condition that he should swear to deliver up the castle of Rochester, and to quit England for ever. Odo was conducted with a small escort to the fortress: but Eustace easily discerned the contradiction between his words and his looks, and pretending that he was a traitor to the cause, made both the bishop and his guard prisoners. The success of this artifice inflamed the indignation of William: messengers were despatched to hasten reinforcements;² and the place was vigorously attacked, and as obstinately defended, till the ravages of a pestilential disease compelled the earl of Boulogne to propose a capitulation. It was with difficulty that the Normans in the king's service prevailed on him to spare the lives of the garrison; but the request of Odo, that at his departure the besiegers should abstain from every demonstration of triumph, was contemptuously refused. The moment he appeared, the trumpets were ordered to flourish; and, as he passed through the ranks, the English sounded the words "halter" and "gallows" in his ears. He slunk away, muttering threats of vengeance, and embarking on board the first vessel he could procure, directed his course to Normandy.³

The hopes of the insurgents were now at an end. The characteristic indolence of Robert had caused him to procrastinate his voyage to England till the favourable opportunity had passed away; and the scanty succours which he had sent to his partisans had been intercepted by the English mariners. Montgomery had made his peace with the king; the city of Durham had surrendered to an army of royalists; and the rebels in the neighbourhood of Worcester had been defeated with the loss of five hundred men by the tenants of Wulstan, bishop of that city. The principal insurgents, reduced to despair, escaped to Normandy: their estates were divided among the faithful friends of the king.⁴

¹ Chron. Sax. 193, 194. Orderic, 665, 666. Sim. 214. Paris, 12.

² All freemen from towns and manors were ordered to attend under the penalty of being pronounced "nithings."—Chron. Sax. 195. Nithing or nithering nequam sonat.—Malm. 68; Paris, 12. Similar instances are to be met with on other occasions, when the king under the same penalty summons all persons able to bear arms. It was what in Normandy was called the Arriere bann. Besides ordinary expeditions, in which the prince could claim only the services of his own tenants, he might also publish l'arrierban, auquel trestous, grans et petits, pourtant que ils soient convenables pour armes porter, sont tenus sans excusation nulle, à fair lui aid et profit à tout leur poair.—Du Fresne, iii. 832.

³ Chron. Sax. 195. Orderic, 667—669. Sim. 215. Alur. Bev. 137.

⁴ Chron. Sax. ibid. Sim. 215. Malm. 67. 68.

In describing the sequel of William's reign I shall desert the chronological order of events, and collect them under appropriate heads; an arrangement which will relieve the attention of the reader, at the same time that it abridges the toil of the writer. I. Normandy at this period presented a wide scene of anarchy and violence. Robert held the reins of government with a feeble grasp, and his lenity and indecision exposed him to the contempt of his turbulent barons. The Conqueror had compelled them to admit his troops into their castles; but at his death they expelled the royal garrisons, levied forces, and made war on each other. The new duke would not, or dared not, interfere. He consumed his revenue in his pleasures; and by improvident grants diminished the ducal demesnes. His poverty compelled him to solicit the assistance of Henry, to whom he sold for three thousand pounds the Cotentin, almost the third part of the duchy; and his jealousy induced him to order the arrest and confinement of the same prince, as soon as he returned from England, where he had gone to claim the dower of his mother Matilda. To William, who sought to be revenged on Robert, and who never refused to employ the aid of bribery or fraud, this disturbed state of things offered an alluring prospect; and, by means of a judicious distribution of presents, he obtained through the perfidy of his Norman adherents possession of St. Valeri, of Albemarle, and of almost every fortress on the right bank of the Seine. Alarmed at so dangerous a defection, the duke solicited the interference of the king of France, who marched a powerful army to the confines of Normandy, but on the receipt of a considerable sum from England, returned into his own dominions.¹

At the same time Robert nearly lost Rouen, the capital of Normandy. Conan, the wealthiest and most powerful of the citizens, had engaged to deliver it up to William, and the duke, to defeat the project, solicited the aid of Henry, whom he had lately released, and of several of his barons. On the third of November Gilbert de l'Aigle was seen to the south of the city leading a body of men to the assistance of Robert; while Reginald de Warrenne appeared on the north with three hundred knights in the service of the king of England. The adherents of Conan instantly divided to receive their friends, and repulse their foes; Robert and Henry (who were now reconciled) descended from the castle with their followers, and the streets of the city were filled with confusion and bloodshed. So doubtful was the issue, that the duke, at the request of his friends, withdrew to a place of safety; but at last the English were expelled, and Conan was conducted a captive into the fortress. By Robert he was condemned to perpetual confinement; but Henry, who was well acquainted with the lenity of his brother, requested and obtained the custody of the prisoner. He immediately led him to the highest tower, bade him survey the beauty of the surrounding scenery, and then seizing him by the waist, hurled him over the battlements. The unhappy Conan was dashed to pieces; the prince turning to the bystanders coolly observed that treason ought never to go unpunished.²

In the following January William crossed the sea with a numerous army. By the Normans, who derived advantage from the calamities of their country, his arrival was hailed with welcome; but the barons who held lands under both the brothers, laboured to effect a reconciliation; and a treaty of peace was negotiated under the mediation of the French monarch. The policy of William again triumphed over the credulity of Robert. He retained possession of the fortresses which he had acquired in Normandy; but promised to indemnify his brother by an equivalent in England, and to restore to their estates his friends, who had been attainted for the late insurrection. By an additional article it was stipulated that, on the decease of either of the two princes, the survivor should succeed to his dominions.¹

¹ Alur. Bev. 138.

² Compare Malmesbury (p. 88), with Orderic (p. 690).

The principal sufferers by this treaty were Edgar the Etheling, and Prince Henry. Edgar had been the confidential friend of Robert; but at the demand of William he was deprived of his estates in Normandy, and compelled to seek an asylum with his brother-in-law, the king of Scotland. The abilities and pretensions of Henry had long been subjects of alarm to both the king and the duke. They now united their forces, took possession of his castles, and besieged him on Mount St. Michael, a lofty rock, which by the influx of the tide was insulated twice in the day. The place was deemed impregnable; but the want of water caused it to be evacuated by the garrison at the end of a fortnight; and Henry with difficulty obtained permission to retire into Bretagne. For two years he wandered in the Vexin, suffering the privations of poverty, and attended only by a knight, a chaplain, and three esquires. At length he accepted from the inhabitants of Damfront the government of their town; and gradually recovered the greater part of his former possessions.²

The siege of Mount St. Michael was distinguished by an occurrence which has been celebrated by our historians as a proof of William's magnanimity. Riding alone, he espied at a distance a few cavaliers belonging to the enemy, whom he immediately charged with his usual intrepidity. In the shock he was beaten to the ground; and his horse, which had been wounded, dragged him some paces in the stirrup. His adversary had already raised his sword to take the life of the fallen monarch, when William exclaimed: "Hold, fellow, I am the king of England." Awed by his voice, his opponents raised him from the ground; a fresh horse was offered him; and the king vaulting into the saddle, inquired which of them was his conqueror. The man apologised for his ignorance. "Make no excuse," replied William, "you are a brave and worthy knight. Henceforth you shall fight under my banner."³

By what pretexts the king eluded the execution of his treaty with Robert we are ignorant. It was in vain that the duke accompanied him to England to receive the promised indemnity; in vain that he repeated his demand by successive messengers. At length he despatched two heralds, who, having obtained an audience, renounced, in the name of their master, the friendship of William, and declared him a false and perjured knight. To defend his honour, the king followed them to Normandy, and pleaded his cause before the twenty-four barons, who, at the signature of the treaty, had sworn, twelve on the one side, and twelve on the other, to enforce its execution. They decided in favour of Robert; and from their decision William appealed to the sword. Success attended his first efforts; but the balance was turned by the arrival of the king of France to the assistance of his vassal, and by the subsequent surrender of Argensey and Hulme, with fifteen hundred knights, their esquires and followers. William had again recourse to his usual expedient of bribery; and the manner in which he raised the money deserves the praise of ingenuity. He demanded reinforcements from England, and twenty thousand men were assembled; but when they had been drawn up to embark, each soldier was ordered to pay ten shillings for the king's use, and to march back to his own home.¹ With the money thus acquired William purchased the retreat of the French king, and despising the unassisted efforts of his brother, returned, after an inglorious campaign, to his English dominions.²

¹ Chron. Sax. 196, 197. Al. Bev. 133.

² Orderic, 896, 698.

³ Malm. 68.

But that which the king had so long endeavoured to obtain by force, was at last spontaneously surrendered by the chivalrous spirit of Robert. It was now four centuries and a half since Palestine fell under the yoke of the Moslem. When Jerusalem opened its gates in 636 to the khalif Omar, that conqueror granted to the inhabitants their lands and property and churches, with the free exercise of their religion, and also took under his protection the foreign Christians who might come to visit, according to custom, the holy places. This capitulation, so favourable to both natives and pilgrims, was faithfully observed for some hundred years by the successors of Omar in the khalifat at Bagdad. It was broken in 935 by the successful irruption of a horde of Turks, who obtained possession of Jerusalem. Hakim, the third of the Fatimite khalifs, recovered the city; but it was won again by the Turks in 1076, and was incorporated by them in the new kingdom of Roum, established by Soliman in Asia Minor. These barbarians from the wilds of Siberia cared little for the capitulation formerly granted by Omar. The pilgrims, when any ventured among them, were subjected to tolls, extortions, and insults; the native Christians were treated as slaves, their churches polluted, their priests imprisoned, or massacred. In 1094, Peter the Hermit, from the diocese of Amiens, had the courage to visit the holy places. His soul was wrung with anguish at the horrors and oppression which he witnessed. But how was he, an unknown pilgrim, to devise a remedy for the evil? Hopeless and romantic as the attempt might appear, the enthusiast undertook to effect it. Returning to Europe, he delivered to Pope Urban II. a letter from the patriarch Simeon, and communicated to him a plan for a general association of the Latin Christians. From Rome he traversed Italy, France, and part of Germany, everywhere describing to the crowds that surrounded him, the misery of their brethren in the East, and the cruelties of the Turks, their hatred of Christianity, and their determination to sweep it from the face of the earth. Urban soon afterwards received an embassy from Constantinople, sent by Alexius Comnenus, soliciting in the most earnest terms the aid of the western nations, to preserve what still remained of the Greek empire, the last and feeble barrier between them and the common enemy. Urban in the council of Clermont—the hermit was standing at the side of the papal throne—called on all present to lay aside the dissensions which prevailed among them, and to fuera, unicuique decem solidos, abstulit.—Alur. Bev. 141.

¹ This sum was what each had received from his lord, or was supposed to carry with him, for his support during the campaign. Pecuniam, quæ ipsis ad victum data

² Chron. Sax. 188, 200, 201.

unite in one general attempt to drive back the Turkish hordes, and to rescue from pollution the Sepulchre of Christ. "It is the will of God," was the universal cry of the hearers. Clerks and laymen crowded to take the cross; these on their return to their homes diffused the same fervour among their countrymen; and thousands hastened from every corner of Europe to shed their blood in so sacred a cause. The adventurous mind of Robert burnt to share in this enterprise; but to appear among the confederate princes with the splendour due to his birth and station, required an expense to which his poverty was unequal. As his only resource, he applied to the avarice of his brother; and in consideration of the sum of ten thousand marks, offered him the government of his dominions during the five following years. The proposal was instantly accepted. William summoned a great council, and, alleging his poverty, appealed to the generosity of his faithful barons; they, on their return home, required in the same manner the aid of their tenants; and the whole amount, wrung in reality from the lower orders in the state, was paid into the exchequer, and transmitted to Normandy. Robert departed with a joyful heart in quest of dangers and glory; William sailed to the continent, and demanded immediate possession of Normandy and of Le Maine.¹

By the Normans he was received without opposition; the Mançeaux unanimously rejected his authority in favour of Helie de la Flèche. Helie was the nephew of Herbert, the last earl, by the youngest of his three sisters. The eldest had been married to Azo, marquis of Liguria; and the second was betrothed to Robert, the son of the Conqueror. Though she died before the marriage could be celebrated, Robert claimed the succession, conquered Le Maine with the aid of his father, and did homage for the earldom to Fulk of Anjou, the superior lord. The Mançeaux rebelled; the son of the eldest sister sold his claim to Helie for ten thousand shillings; and the young adventurer by his own prowess and the favour of the natives obtained possession of the earldom. Though he had taken the cross, the claims and menaces of William detained him at home; but one day, having incautiously entered a wood with no more than seven knights, he was made prisoner by Robert Talavace; and the king immediately marched at the head of fifty thousand horsemen into his territories. Fulk had already arrived to protect his vassal; a few skirmishes were succeeded by a negotiation; and Helie obtained his liberty by the surrender of Mans. Being thus dispossessed of his dominions, he offered his services to William; but at the instigation of Robert, earl of Mellent, they were indignantly refused. "If you will not have me for a friend," exclaimed Helie, "you shall learn to fear me as an enemy." "Go," replied the king, "and do thy worst."²

The next summer William was hunting in the New Forest in Hampshire, when a messenger arrived to inform him, that Helie had defeated the Normans and surprised the city of Mans; that the inhabitants had again acknowledged him for their earl; and that the garrison, shut up in the castle, would soon be reduced to extremity. The impatience of the king could hardly wait for the conclusion of the tale, when, crying out to his attendants "Let those that love me, follow," he rode precipitately to the sea-shore, and embarked in the first vessel which he found. The master remonstrated that the weather was stormy, and the passage dangerous. "Hold thy peace," said William, "kings are never drowned." He landed the next day at Barfleur, assembled his troops, and advanced with such rapidity, that Helie could scarcely find time to save himself by flight. The king ravaged the lands of his enemies, and returned to England.¹

¹ Chron. Sax. 204. Order. 713, 764. Al. Rev. 142. Malm. 70.

² Orderic, 769, 771—773.

II. Of the hostilities between England and Scotland the blame must rest with the king of Scots, who lost his life in the contest. William was in Normandy prosecuting his designs against Robert, when Malcolm suddenly crossed the frontiers, and gratified the rapacity of his followers with the spoil of the northern counties. After the reconciliation of the two brothers, the king of England undertook to revenge the insult. As he marched through Durham, he restored the bishop of that see. His fleet was dispersed in a storm; but his cavalry traversed the Lothians, and penetrated as far as the great river, which the Scots called "the water."² The hostile armies were ranged on the opposite shores; and the two kings had mutually defied each other, when a peace was concluded through the mediation of Robert of Normandy on the one side, and of Edgar the Etheling on the other. Malcolm submitted to do homage to the English monarch, and to render him the services which he had rendered to William's father; and William engaged to grant to the Scottish king the twelve manors, and the annual pension of twelve marks of gold, which he had enjoyed under the Conqueror.³ Nor was the interest of the Etheling forgotten in the negotiation. He was permitted to return to England, and obtained a distinguished place in the court of William.

Two hundred years had elapsed since Carlisle was laid in ruins by the Northmen. When the Conqueror returned from his Scottish expedition, he found it in the possession of one of his barons, and admiring the situation, ordered it to be fortified. William adopted the policy of his father. He visited the spot, expelled Dolphin, the lord of the district, peopled the city with a colony of Englishmen from the southern counties, and built a castle for their protection.⁴ It is possible that, as Cumberland was formerly held by the heir of the Scottish crown, Malcolm might consider the settlement of an English colony at Carlisle as an invasion of his rights; it is certain that a new quarrel was created between the two nations, of which we know not the origin nor the particulars. The Scottish king was invited or summoned to attend William's court at Gloucester; and at his arrival found himself excluded from the royal presence, unless he would consent to plead his cause, and submit to the judgment of the English barons.

¹ Orderic, 774. Chron. Sax. 207. Malm. 70. This writer tells us that Helie was again taken, and being addressed by the king in these words: "I have you at last, Sir;" replied, "Yes, chance has been in your favour; but were I at liberty, I know what I would do." "Go, then," said William, "and if you get the better, by the face of Lucca (his usual oath), I will demand no return for your freedom." This appears to me no more than a second version of the conversation mentioned above. On the death of William, Helie recovered his earldom.—Orderic, 784. ³ Orderic, 701.

² The mention of these twelve manors

will bring to the reader's recollection the twelve villa, which Edgar had given to Kenneth, that he might have habitations of his own when he was on his journey to attend the English court. See the reign of Edgar, p. 137. Some question has been raised as to the place where the kings met, because the Chronicle says, that Malcolm "came out of Scotland into Lothian in England."—Chron. p. 197. Perhaps the difficulty will disappear, when we recollect that by the writers of this age the name of Scotland was confined to the territory lying north of the Forth.

⁴ West. 227. Chron. Sax. 198.

Malcolm indignantly rejected the proposal. The kings of Scotland, he said, had never been accustomed "to do right" to the kings of England but on the borders of the two realms, and according to the joint decision of the barons of both countries.¹ He retired in anger, assembled his retainers, and burst with a numerous force into Northumberland, where he perished, a victim to the wiles of his enemy, perhaps to the treachery of his own subjects. The Scottish army was surprised by Robert Mowbray. Malcolm fell by the sword of Morel, Mowbray's steward; his eldest son Edward shared the fate of his father; and of the fugitives who escaped the pursuit of their foes, the greater number were lost in the waters of the Alne and the Tweed. The bodies of the king and his son were found by peasants, and brought by them for burial to the abbey of Tinnmouth. The mournful intelligence hastened the death of his consort, Queen Margaret, who survived her husband only four days.²

The children of Malcolm, too young to assert their rights, sought the protection of their uncle the etheling Edgar in England; and the Scottish sceptre was seized by the ambition of Donald Bane, the brother of the deceased monarch. He found a competitor in Duncan, a son, perhaps illegitimate, of Malcolm, who had long resided as a hostage in the English court. The nephew, with the aid of William, to whom he swore fealty, proved too strong for the uncle; and Donald secreted himself in the Highlands, till the murder of Duncan by Malpeit, earl of Mearns, replaced in his hands the reins of government. He held them only three years. The Etheling by order of the English king conducted an army into Scotland, seated his nephew Edgar on the throne, as feudatory to William, and restored the children of his sister Margaret to their former honours. Donald, who had been taken in his flight, and committed to prison, died of grief.³

III. Ever since Harold had effected the reduction of Wales, the natives had acknowledged themselves the vassals of the king of England; but their ancient hostility was not yet extinguished, and the prospect of plunder, with the chance of impunity, led them repeatedly to ravage the neighbouring counties. To repress their inroads the Conqueror had ordered castles to be built on the borders, which he intrusted to the care of officers, denominated marquesses, or lords of the marches.⁴ These marches were the constant theatre of predatory warfare and barbarian revenge. But in 1094 the natives of every district in Wales rose in arms; the Isle of Anglesey was reduced; and Cheshire, Shropshire, and Herefordshire, from one extremity to the other, were desolated with fire and sword. The next

¹ Reetitudinem facere.—Alur. Rev. 139. Sim. Dun. 218. Flor. 645. This expression has been explained, to do homage. It means, to answer for any alleged failure in the performance of feudal services.

² Chron. Sax. 197—199. Sim. 218. Orderic, 701. The Scottish historians pretend that Malcolm was killed at the siege of Alnwick by the perfidy of the governor, who, pretending to offer him the keys of the place at the end of a spear, pushed the spear into his brain. It may be granted that there was something of fraud or treachery in the transaction from the expressions of Orderic (701), and of the Chronicle (heswykene, 199) but the Scottish account seems inconsistent with the fact, that the bodies of Malcolm and Edward were found on the ground by peasants, and buried by them at Tynemouth, a considerable distance from Alnwick.

³ Chron. Sax. 199, 201, 206. Malm. 89. Sim. 219. Flor. 646. The contemporary chroniclers represent Duncan as soliciting and obtaining from William a grant of the kingdom of Scotland. Ut ei regnum sui patris concederet, petit et impetravit; illicque fidelitatem juravit.—Sim. Dun. 219. Flor. 646. See also Ethelred, 343. Edgar was "king holding of King William."⁵—Chron. Sax. 206.

⁴ Orderic, 670.

year the insurgents surprised the castle of Montgomery, and massacred the inhabitants. The resentment of William urged him to retaliate; and, in imitation of Harold, he undertook to traverse the whole principality at the head of an army. But the heavy cavalry of the Normans was ill adapted to the invasion of a rugged and mountainous country. The Welsh had the wisdom not to oppose his progress; but they hovered on his flanks, drove forward his rear, and cut off his detachments; and when the king, after a slow and tedious march of five weeks, had reached the mountains of Snowdon, he found to his mortification that the loss of the conquerors exceeded that of the vanquished. The next year the lords of the marches prosecuted the war by ravaging the lands in the neighbourhood; and the following summer the king resumed his operations, but with similar results. The loss of men, of horses, and of baggage, convinced him of the inutility of the enterprise. He retired out of Wales in despair, adopted the policy of his father, and by drawing a chain of castles round the country, endeavoured to put a stop to the incursions of these restless and inaccessible enemies.¹

IV. The most powerful of the Anglo-Norman barons was Robert Mowbray, earl of Northumberland. He had inherited from his uncle, the bishop of Coutances, no fewer than two hundred and eighty manors: the first families in the nation were allied to him by blood or affinity; and his command in the north had placed at his disposal the services of a numerous and warlike population. By his orders four Norwegian merchantmen of considerable value had been detained and plundered; and when the king, at the petition of the owners, summoned him to answer for the offence, the royal mandate was repeatedly slighted and disobeyed. William undertook to chastise the insolence of his vassal; his rapidity disconcerted the friends of the earl; the principal of the Northumbrian chieftains were surprised and made prisoners: and the strong castle of Tinnmouth, after a siege of two months, was compelled to surrender. Still from the walls of Bamborough Mowbray continued to defy the arms of his sovereign; nor did William undertake the hopeless task of reducing that impregnable fortress; but, in the vicinity erected another castle, which he appropriately denominated Malvoisin, or the bad neighbour. At length the earl was decoyed from his asylum. An insidious offer to betray into his hands the town of Newcastle induced him to quit Bamborough in the dead of the night with no more than thirty horsemen. The garrison of Malvoisin immediately followed; the gates of Newcastle were shut; and the earl fled from his pursuers to the monastery of St. Oswin. During five days he valiantly defended himself against the repeated assaults of a superior enemy; on the sixth he was wounded in the leg, and made prisoner. The captive, by the royal order, was conducted to Bamborough, and his countess Matilda was invited to a parley. From the walls she beheld her lord in bonds with the executioner by his side, prepared to put out his eyes, if she refused to surrender the fortress. Her affection (they had been married only three months) subdued her repugnance; the gates were thrown open; and Morell, the governor, to ingratiate himself with the conqueror, revealed the particulars of an extensive and dangerous conspiracy to place on the throne Stephen of Albemarle, brother to Judith, of infamous memory. Hugh, earl of Shrewsbury, purchased his pardon for three thousand pounds; Walter de

¹ Chron. Sax. 203, 4, 5. Sim. 219. Malm. 68.

Lacy escaped to the continent; Odo, earl of Holderness, forfeited his estates and was imprisoned; Mowbray himself was condemned to perpetual confinement, and lived nearly thirty years in the castle of Windsor. William, count of Eu, a near relation of the king, fought his accuser, was vanquished, and lost his eyes. The fate of William of Alderic, the king's godfather, excited more commiseration. He was sentenced to be hanged; but the integrity of his life, and his asseverations at the gallows, convinced the public that he was innocent.¹

V. At the death of the Conqueror the royal treasury of Winchester contained sixty thousand pounds of silver, besides gold and precious stones;² and, if to this sum we add the annual revenue of the crown, we may safely pronounce William to have been at his accession a most opulent monarch. But no accumulation of wealth, however large, no supply, however abundant, could equal the waste of his prodigality. He spurned at restraint; and in his dress and table, in his pleasures and presents, left far behind him the most extravagant of his contemporaries.³ Immense sums were lavished in purchasing or rewarding the services of foreigners, who, whatever might be their country or their character, were assured of receiving a gracious welcome from the king of England.⁴ When his resources began to fail, the deficiency was supplied by extortion; nor was there any expedient, however base or unjust, which he hesitated for a moment to adopt, if it served to replenish his coffers. The authority which Archbishop Lanfranc derived from his age and station contributed to check for a few years the royal extravagance; but the death of that prelate in 1089 removed every restraint; and, in the place of an importunate monitor, the king substituted a rapacious and remorseless minister. Ralf (afterwards surnamed the Flambard, or devouring torch) was a Norman clergyman of obscure birth, of ready wit, dissolute morals, and insatiable ambition. He had followed the court of the Conqueror, and first attracted notice in the capacity of a public informer. From the service of Maurice, bishop of London, he passed to that of William, who soon discovered his merit, and gradually raised him to the highest situation in the kingdom, by appointing him to the offices of royal chaplain, treasurer, and justiciary. The minister was sensible, that to retain the favour, it was necessary to flatter the vices of his master; and his ingenuity was successfully employed in devising new methods of raising money. The liberty of hunting was circumscribed by additional penalties; to multiply fines, new offences were created; capital punishments were commuted for pecuniary mulcts; and another survey of the kingdom was ordered, to raise the land-tax of those estates which had been underrated in the record of Domesday. By these arts Flambard earned the eulogium, which was pronounced on him by the king, that he was the only man who, to please a master, was willing to brave the vengeance of the rest of mankind.⁵

If, however, he eluded that vengeance, his preservation was owing more to his good fortune than to the protection of William. One day, as he was walking by the side of the Thames, Gerold, a mariner who had

¹ Chron. Sax. 202—204. Sim. 221. Orderic, 703, 704. Alur. Bev. 141, 142. Bromp. 992. The Count d'Eu cæcatus et extesticulatus est.—Malm. 70.

² Ingulf, 108.

³ Malm. 69. He tells us that the king refused a pair of hose because they had cost only three shillings, and put on a worse pair, when his chamberlain assured him that they had cost a mark.—Ibid.

⁴ He was, according to Suger, mirabilis militum mercator et solidator.—Vit. Lud. Grossi, 233.

⁵ Malm. 69, 158. Orderic, 678, 786.

formerly been in his service, but now pretended to be a messenger from the bishop of London, requested him to step into a boat, and visit that prelate, whom he represented as lying at the point of death in a villa on the opposite bank. Unsuspicious of danger, Flam-bard complied; but, when the boat had conveyed him a little way down the river, he was forcibly put on board a ship, and carried out to sea. Fortunately a storm arose; the men who had engaged to murder him quarrelled; Gerold was induced by promises and entreaties to put him on shore; and on the third day, to the terror and amazement of his enemies, he appeared in his usual place at court. As a compensation he obtained the bishopric of Durham; but the king was not in the habit of conferring benefits without a return; and the favourite, to prove his gratitude, made him a present of one thousand pounds.¹

In the payment of this sum Flam-bard had been caught in his own toils; though, if gratuitous promotion could be hoped for, under a prince like William, he might have expected it, who to his other claims of remuneration, added the merit of having discovered a new and productive source of revenue in the custody and sale of the vacant abbeys and bishoprics. Before the Conquest, on the demise of an abbot or prelate, the care of the temporalities devolved on the diocesan or the archbishop; under the Conqueror it was intrusted to a clergyman appointed by the king, and compelled to render an exact account of his administration to the next incumbent.² Flambard pronounced both these customs an infringement of the rights of the crown. He contended that the prelaties were fiefs held of the king, the revenues of which, on the death of the actual tenant, ought to revert to the sovereign, till he, of his special grace, bestowed them on a new abbot or bishop. Acting on these principles, he took every vacant prelacy under his own care. Inferior officers were appointed to administer the temporalities for the benefit of the crown; by these the lands and profits were farmed out to speculators by public auction; and the existing tenant, sensible that he might at any moment be ejected at the suit of a higher bidder, lost no time in converting his bargain into a source of the greatest possible advantage. The reader may easily conceive the extortions and dilapidations which were the invariable consequences of so iniquitous a system. The monks and the clergy belonging to the church were often compelled to seek a precarious subsistence from the charity of strangers: and the men of the prelate, those who held their lands of the church, were generally reduced to the lowest degree of penury. Nor did the mischief end here. Wealth so easily acquired was not easily surrendered: William kept the vacant bishoprics and abbeys for several years in his own possession: and, if he consented at last to name a successor, it was previously understood that the new prelate should pay a sum into the Exchequer, proportionate to the value of the benefice.³

During Lent, in the fourth year after the demise of Lanfranc, the king was taken dangerously ill; and he, who in health had set at defiance the laws of God and man, began to tremble at the probable approach of death. The celebrated Anselm, a native of Aoust in Piedmont, and abbot of Bec in Normandy, had at this period accidentally arrived in England at the request of Hugh, earl of Chester. His reputation induced William to send for him to Gloucester; and by his advice the sick monarch engaged to amend his conduct, restored to different churches the estates of which he had unjustly deprived them, forgave by proclamation all offences committed against the crown, and promised to his people, in the event of his recovery, an upright administration of justice. During his health he had frequently been solicited to nominate a successor to Lanfranc; and had as frequently replied that he would never part with the temporalities of Canterbury till his death. The bishops seized the present moment to renew their importunities; and William, in the fervour of his repentance, exclaimed that he gave that office to Anselm. The pious monk at this unexpected declaration was filled with alarm and sadness; the vexations and inquietudes to which he was likely to be exposed rushed on his mind, and he felt himself unequal to a perpetual contest with a prince of insatiable avarice, impetuous passions, and without principles of morality or respect for religion. But it was in vain that he repeatedly refused to acquiesce in the royal choice. He was dragged to the bed of the king; a crosier was brought into the room; this emblem of the archiepiscopal dignity was forced into his hand; and the Te Deum was sung in thanksgiving for the event. Anselm still protested against the violence of his election, and declared that it was of no avail, since he was the subject not of the king of England, but of the duke of Normandy. But the consent of Robert was easily obtained; the archbishop of Rouen ordered him to obey; and the reluctant abbot, after a long and violent struggle, submitted to the advice of his friends and the commands of his superiors.¹

¹ Ang. Sac. i. 706. Knyghton, 2369. Simeon, 224.

² Orderic, 516, 679. Pet. Bles. contin. 111. Alur. Bev. 143.

³ Orderic, 763, 774. The king at his death had in his hands one archbishopric, four bishoprics, and eleven abbeys, all of which had been let out to farm.—Bles. 111.

What Anselm had foretold was soon realized. William recovered, became ashamed of his weakness, revoked the pardons which he had granted, and relapsed into his usual rapacity and despotism. Nor were his morals less reprehensible than his system of government. His court had become a constant scene of debauchery. In order that he might indulge his passions with less restraint, he refused to marry; the young nobility courted the favour of their sovereign by imitating his example; and in the society of flatterers and prostitutes the decencies of life and the prohibitions of religion were equally exposed to outrage and derision.² Such conduct added force to the objections of Anselm, who, though he was already invested with the temporalities of the archbishopric, allowed seven months to elapse before he could be induced to do homage to the king, and receive the archiepiscopal consecration. He had previously required that all the lands of his see should be restored, and that William should follow his advice in matters regarding the welfare of his soul. To these requests an evasive answer was returned: "That the just expectations of the archbishop should not be disappointed."³

From the subsequent treatment of Anselm a plan appears to have been already arranged for subduing the independent spirit of the new archbishop. On the very day on which he entered Canterbury, and as he was going in procession to his cathedral, Flambard arrested him in the street,

¹ Radmer, 16—19.

² Malm. 69. Orderic, 682, 763. Luxurie scelus tacendum exercebat, non occulte, sed ex impudentia coram sole.—Hunt. 216; Paris, 46. Anselm adds: nefandissimum

Sodomæ scelus noviter in hac terra divulgatum, jam plurimum pullulavit, multosque sua immanitate fœdavit.—Ead. 24. From this passage I should infer that it was introduced by the Normans. ³ Ead. 19, 20, 23.

and summoned him to answer in the king's court for some imputed breach of the royal prerogative.¹ His tenants, during several months, were compelled to pay their rents into the Exchequer; and those to whom William had alienated the archiepiscopal manors were encouraged to retain them under the authority of the crown.² Though Anselm found himself reduced to such poverty, that the expenses of his household were defrayed by the abbot of St. Alban's,³ he was given to understand that the king expected a present in return for his promotion. With great difficulty he raised the sum of five hundred pounds; but it was scornfully refused as unworthy the royal acceptance. "Do not, my lord," said the primate, "spurn my offer. Though the first, it will not be the last present of your archbishop. Use me like a freeman, and I devote myself, with all that I have, to your service; but if you treat me as a slave, you will have neither me nor mine."—"Go," replied the king in a rage, "I want neither thee nor thine." Anselm departed; and to prove that he was not actuated by a spirit of parsimony, distributed the whole sum to the poor.⁴

He was now, in the phraseology of the court, out of the king's favour; but it was privately intimated to him, that on the offer of one thousand pounds all former causes of offence would be forgotten. Anselm, superior to the temptations of hope and fear, neglected the suggestion. The bishops had assembled at Hastings, to take their leave of the king previously to his departure for Normandy; and the primate earnestly requested them to reconcile him with his sovereign. William dictated the terms; that he should pay five hundred pounds immediately, and engage to pay five hundred more within a certain term. Anselm replied that he was without money himself, and that his vassals, impoverished by the royal exactions, were unable to supply him with the sum required. "Then," exclaimed the king, "as I hated him yesterday, so I hate him more to-day, and will hate him still more bitterly the longer I live. He shall never be acknowledged by me for archbishop. Let him go. He need not wait here to give me his blessing when I sail. I will not receive it."⁵

There were at the time two competitors for the papacy, the antipope Clement, and Urban II., the legitimate successor of Gregory VII. This was a favourable opportunity for William, who, affecting to hesitate between the two, refused to acknowledge either, that he might enjoy with less restraint the revenues of the vacant prelacies.⁶ But Anselm, in common with the Norman clergy, had admitted the authority of Urban; before he consented to his election, he notified the circumstance to the king; and he now solicited permission to receive from the pontiff the pallium, the distinguishing badge of the archiepiscopal dignity. At the very men-¹ Ead. 20. By similar threats and prosecutions he extorted from Bloet, bishop of Lincoln, no less than 5,000 pounds of silver.—Brompt. 888.

² Brompt. ibid. Ead. 20. Ep. Ansel. iii. 24.

³ Paris, Vit. Abbat. 1004.

⁴ Ead. 21, 22. It was, according to Anselm himself, in his letter to the archbishop of Lyons, pecunia non parva. He probably borrowed it: for the lands of his church were in such a state that three years elapsed before he was able to maintain the usual archiepiscopal establishment.—Ead. 108.

⁵ Ead. 23—25.

⁶ It was not that the English Church rejected the papal supremacy, but that the bishops had not been permitted to inquire into the claims of the competitors, and therefore suspended their obedience. Quis eorum canonicus, quis secus fuerit institutus, ab Anglis usque id temporis ignorabatur.—Ead. 32. Dubitabant propter illam quæ nata est dissensionem, et propter dubitationem illum suscipere quasi certum differebant.—Epis. Ansel. iii. 36.

tion of Urban, William burst into a paroxysm of rage. "Could he be ignorant that to acknowledge any prelate for pope, before he had been acknowledged by the sovereign, was a breach of allegiance? This was the peculiar prerogative of the kings of England; it distinguished them from other monarchs, none of whom possessed it. To dispute this right was to tear the crown from his head. Anselm should answer for his presumption before his peers."¹ The enemies of the archbishop now predicted that he would either be compelled to resign the mitre, or to disgrace himself by abjuring the authority of the pontiff. The court was held at Rockingham. Every artifice was employed to shake the resolution of Anselm; he was assailed with threats and promises; he was accused of ingratitude; he was reviled with the appellation of traitor. The last charge called him from his seat. "If any man," he exclaimed, "pretend that I violate the faith which I have sworn to the king, because I will not reject the authority of the bishop of Rome, let him come forward, and he will find me prepared in the name of God to answer him as I ought."² The challenge was not accepted; but the king, turning to the bishops, ordered them to depose him. They answered that it was not in their power. He commanded them to abjure his authority, and they complied. He then called on the lay barons to imitate the example of the prelates; but they, to his utter discomfiture, refused. Disconcerted and enraged, he put off the decision of the question for two months; and calling the bishops around him, successively interrogated each in what sense he had abjured the authority of Anselm? Some replied unconditionally; and these he called his friends, and ordered to sit down. Others said that they had abjured it only inasmuch as the primate acknowledged a pope, who had not yet been acknowledged by the English church. These were commanded to quit the hall, with the assurance that they had forfeited the royal favour. To repurchase it, each was compelled to make the king a valuable present.³

If I have entered into these details, it was that the reader might the more easily appreciate the character of William, and notice the proceedings in these arbitrary courts of justice. There was something ludicrous in the result of the contest. The king sent clandestinely a messenger to Rome, acknowledged without solicitation the authority of Urban, privately procured from him the pallium, and after several fruitless attempts to sell it, at last allowed it to be given to the archbishop. But, though Anselm was in this instance successful, he had still reason to regret the tranquillity of his cell. The hatred which rankled in the breast of the king was often visible in his conduct; and he suffered no opportunity to escape of thwarting the endeavours, and wounding the feelings of the primate. In defiance of his remonstrances, William retained possession of the vacant benefices; prevented the convocation of synods; refused to restore the manors belonging to the see of Canterbury; and after an expedition into Wales, cited the archbishop before him, for having sent his retainers without a competent supply of arms and provisions. The charge

¹ Ead. 25, 26. Of this prerogative, though it had sprung up under his father, Flambard said, that it was præcipuum in omni dominatione sua, et quo eum cunctis regibus præstare certum erat.—Id. 29.

² Id. 28, 29. Anselm has been blamed for having given to the pope during the debate, the titles of bishop of bishops, prince of all men, and angel of the great council. Whoever will peruse the original, will be convinced that the charge has been made by mistake. It is to Christ, not to the pope, that the archbishop applied these expressions.—See Eadmer, p. 27. ³ Id. 30, 31.

is said to have been false.¹ But Anselm, exhausted by groundless provocations, instead of pleading his cause, solicited permission to retire to Rome.² An answer was returned that he might use his own discretion; but that if he left the realm, the king would immediately take possession of his revenues. The primate entering the chamber, said: "Sir, I am going; but as this is probably the last time that we shall meet, I come as your father and archbishop to offer you my blessing." The king bowed his head; Anselm made over him the sign of the cross, and instantly retired. At Dover the royal officers treated him with studied indignity; in France and Italy he was received with every demonstration of respect.³

After the departure of Anselm, William persevered in the same rapacious and voluptuous career, till he was suddenly arrested by death in the New Forest, where his brother Richard had formerly perished. For some time predictions of his approaching fate had been circulated among the people, and were readily believed by those whose piety he had shocked by his debaucheries, or whose hatred he had provoked by his tyranny.⁴ Nor was he without apprehension himself. On the first of August he passed a restless night; and his imagination was so disturbed by dreams, that he sent for his servants to watch near his bed. Before sunrise Fitz-Hamon entered the chamber, and related to him the vision of a foreign monk, which was interpreted to presage some calamity to the king. "The man," he exclaimed, with a forced smile, "dreams like a monk. Give him a hundred shillings." He was, however, unable to conceal the impression which these portents had made on his mind; and, at the request of his friends, abandoned his design of hunting, and devoted the morning to business. At dinner he ate and drank more copiously than usual; his spirits revived; and shortly afterwards he rode out into the forest. There most of his attendants successively left him, separating in pursuit of game; and about sunset he was discovered by some countrymen lying on the ground, and weltering in blood. An arrow, the shaft of which was broken, had entered his breast. The body was conveyed in a cart to Winchester, where it was hastily buried the next morning.⁵ Out of respect to his rank, a grave was allotted him in the cathedral; but it was deemed indecent to honour with religious rites the obsequies of a prince, whose life had been so impious, and whose death was too sudden to encourage a hope that he found time to repent.⁶

By whose hand the king fell, and

¹ Falso a malignis dicebatur. Eadmer in Vit. Ansel. 983.

² The Conqueror had required that no bishop should visit Rome without his permission: a regulation which excited the loud complaint of Gregory VII. Nemo omnium regum etiam paganorum contra sedem apostolicam hoc præsumpsit attentare.—Epist. Greg. VII. 1.

³ Ead. 32—34, 36—41. The archbishop in his letter to the pope thus sums up his reasons for leaving the kingdom: "The king would not restore to my church those lands belonging to it, which he had given away after the death of Lanfranc: he even continued to give more away notwithstanding my opposition: he required of me grievous services, which had never been required of my predecessors: he annulled the law of God, and the canonical and apostolical decisions, by customs of his own creation. In such conduct I could not acquiesce without the loss of my own soul; to plead against him in his own court was in vain; for no one dared to assist or advise me. This, then, is my object in coming to you: to beg that you would free me from the bondage of the episcopal dignity, and allow me to serve God again in the tranquillity of my cell; and that in the next place you would provide for the churches of the English according to your wisdom and the authority of your station.—Eadm. 43.

⁴ Ord. 781. ⁵ Malm. 71. ⁶ Ord. 782.

whether by accident or design, are questions which cannot be satisfactorily answered. The report, which obtained credit at the time, was, that William, following a wounded deer with his eyes, held his hand near his face to intercept the rays of the sun, and that at the same moment an arrow from the bow of Walter Tyrrel, a French knight, glancing from a tree, struck him in the breast. It was added, that the unintentional homicide, spurring his horse to the shore, immediately crossed to the continent; and a pilgrimage which he afterwards made to the Holy Land was attributed to remorse, and construed into a proof of his guilt. But Tyrrel always denied the charge; and after his return, when he had nothing to hope or fear, deposed upon oath in the presence of Suger, abbot of St. Denis, that he never saw the king on the day of his death, nor entered that part of the forest in which he fell.¹ If William perished by treason (a supposition not very improbable), it was politic in the assassin to fix the guilt on one who was no longer in the kingdom. This at least is certain, that no inquiry was made into the cause or the manner of his death; whence we may infer that his successor, if he were not convinced that it would not bear investigation, was too well pleased with an event which raised him to the throne, to trouble himself about the means by which it was effected.

Of the violent character of William, his rapacity, despotism, and debauchery, the reader will have formed a sufficient notion from the preceding pages.² In person he was short and corpulent, with flaxen hair, and a ruddy complexion; from which last circumstance he derived the name of Rufus, or the red. In ordinary conversation his utterance was slow and embarrassed; in the hurry of passion precipitate and unintelligible. He assumed in public a haughty port, rolling his eyes with fierceness on the spectators, and endeavouring by the tone of his voice and the tenor of his answers to intimidate those who addressed him. But in private he descended to an equality with his companions, amusing them with his wit, which was chiefly pointed against himself, and seeking to lessen the odium of his excesses, by making them the subjects of laughter.

He built at the expense of the neighbouring counties a wall round the Tower, a bridge over the Thames, and the great hall at Westminster. The latter was finished the year before his death; and when he first visited it after his return from Normandy, he replied to his flatterers, that there was nothing in its dimensions to excite their wonder; it was only the vestibule to the palace which he intended to raise. But in this respect he seems to have followed, not to have created, the taste of the age. During his reign structures of unusual magnificence arose in every part of the kingdom; and the most opulent proprietors sought to distinguish themselves by the castles which they built, and the monasteries which they founded.

¹ Quem cum nec timeret nec speraret, jurejurando sæpius audivimus quasi sacrosanctum asserere, quod ea die nec in eam partem sylvæ, in qua rex venebatur, venerit, nec eum in sylva omnino viderit.—Suger, Vit. Lud. Gros. p. 283. Tyrrel was an inhabitant of Pontoise.—Ord. 78.

² I will only add the character given of him by a celebrated foreign, but contemporary, writer. Lascivie et animi desiderii deditus, pauperum intolerabilis oppressor, ecclesiarum crudelis exactor, et irreverentissimus retentor et dissipator.—Suger, ibid.

APPENDIX.

NOTE A, p. 253.

On the Tapestry of Bayeux.

THIS tapestry is a piece of canvas nineteen inches broad, and about two hundred and twenty-six feet long, worked with worsteds of several colours, and divided into seventy-two compartments, designed to represent in succession the conquest of England by the duke of Normandy.

To make it even probable that this tapestry was, as is often affirmed, the work of the conqueror's queen, Matilda, or a gift from her to the church of Bayeux, it is necessary to show that there exists some historical testimony, or, in the absence of such testimony, some ancient tradition, or, in the absence of both these, something in the character of the tapestry itself, which may serve to connect it with the name of that princess.

1st. That there is no historical testimony which bears in any way on this question, is admitted on all hands.

2nd. Neither is there any ancient tradition. It may be at present the popular belief at Bayeux; but it is not an ancient tradition; it cannot be traced further back than the year 1730, when it is first mentioned by Lancelot and Montfaucon. We are acquainted with earlier writers who have described the city of Bayeux, its cathedral, and its curiosities; but not one of them has ever noticed this supposed tradition. It was probably the conjecture of some antiquary, which was at first gratefully accepted, and has since been carefully preserved by the inhabitants.

We have two ancient inventories of the valuable articles formerly belonging to the church of Bayeux, the one made in 1369, the other in 1476. In both the tapestry is noticed; in neither is any mention made of its origin, or of its donor. The latest of these inventories was made by two of the canons deputed by the chapter for that purpose, who not only enter every article separately, but notice also its circonstances, a word which is made to include the use to which it was applied, the name of the donor, and the tradition of the place with respect to it. Thus they tell us of a chasuble, which belonged to Bishop Odo; of a helmet which belonged to Duke William; of two mantles adorned with jewels, which, according to tradition—comme on dit—were worn by William and Matilda at their marriage; of two hangings, the gift of the patriarch of Jerusalem, and of a very long and narrow piece of tapestry, with drawings and writings representing the conquest of England. Une tente tres longue et etroite de telle à broderie de ymages et escripteaux faisans representation du conquest d'Angleterre. This last was undoubtedly the tapestry in question. Now what are the circonstances? Do the deputies name the donor? Do they notice any tradition concerning it? No. All that they tell us is, that it is yearly hung round the nave of the church on the festival of the relics (July 1), and during the octave. Most assuredly, if there had then existed at Bayeux any popular belief respecting the origin of the tapestry, they would have noticed it in the same manner as they noticed the on dit respecting the two mantles. Their silence then is a satisfactory proof that the tradition to which appeal is now made, had no existence in the middle of the fifteenth century.—See a memoir by De la Rue, in Archæol. xvii. 107, and “Researches and Conjectures on the Bayeux Tapestry,” by Bolton Corney, Esq., a work to which I am indebted for the substance of this note.

3rd. But is there not something in the tapestry itself to induce a belief that it was the work or the gift of Matilda? No: there is absolutely nothing. She is not named in the superscriptions; she is not represented in the drawings. There are three figures of females, but not one of her. There were many compartments into which she might with propriety have been introduced; but she seems to have been as much forgotten by the artist as if he had never heard of her existence. Nor does the costliness of the work bespeak a royal benefactor. It is of the most homely materials, of ordinary canvas worked with worsteds of different tints, which serve only to depict the forms of the objects, and not to imitate their natural colours. There is in it no embroidery of gold, none of silver, none of silk, nothing worthy the rank or the munificence of the supposed donor.

Hence, in the absence of all historical evidence, of all ancient tradition, and of any proof to be derived from the tapestry itself, it is difficult to conceive on what ground it is so confidently and pertinaciously attributed to the queen of the Conqueror.

The reader will have noticed the immense disproportion between the breadth of the tapestry (about 19 inches) and its length (226 feet); a disproportion which shows that it was originally intended to decorate some building of considerable extent. What building was that? Plainly the church of Bayeux; for there we find it centuries ago, annually decorating, on certain festivals, the whole circuit of the nave, its measurement being then, as it still is, the same with that circuit. Whether it would have equally suited the nave of the church which existed in the time of Matilda, may be doubted, for that church was destroyed with the episcopal buildings in 1106, twenty-three years after her death; and the new one was not built till half a century later. But be that as it may, there cannot be a question that the tapestry was originally meant as a decoration for the church of Bayeux; and in the composition of several of the compartments there is much to show that it was designed also to commemorate the share which the men of Bayeux bore in the conquest of England. Of all the noble and powerful chieftains who accompanied the Conqueror, two only, if so many as two—namely, his brother Robert of Moretain, and perhaps Eustace of Boulogne, are depicted in it, and pointed out by name, and that only once; but the attention of the spectator is directed in the same manner to Odo, the bishop of Bayeux, in three separate compartments. Nor is that all. Three other individuals, Turolde, Vital, and Wadard, are equally distinguished in compartments 11, 49, 62. Their names are given, as if they were of higher importance in the estimation of the donor or artist than the most illustrious barons and chieftains in the army. Who then were they? Look into the pages of history, and you will not find them. They were unknown to William of Poitou, and Orderic, and Wace. But open the record of Domesday, and there you meet with them in almost the first page, three men of Bayeux, all homagers of Bishop Odo, all rewarded by him with lands in England for their services. Ralph, the son of Turolde—the father was probably dead when the survey was made—appears in possession of nine different properties in Kent (Domesd. i. 7, 8, 9), Vital of three' (ibid. 7, 10), and Wadard—the hic est Wadard of the tapestry—of more than thirty in the counties of Kent, Surrey, Dorset, Warwick, and Lincoln, besides six burgagemessuages in Dover (ibid. i. 6, 7, 10, 32, 77, 155, 238, 342). What right could these obscure retainers of the bishop of Bayeux have to be depicted and designated by name in preference to the most noble and celebrated of William's associates? I would rather believe that the tapestry originated in the personal vanity of some of these men, or of their descendants, than that Matilda would so highly distinguish them in a work designed by her to commemorate the conquest of England by the arms of her husband.

END OF VOL. I.

